PRINCIPLES OF TEXTUAL CRITICISM

1. Don't never assume nothin.
2. If it don't make sense, you ain't got it right.

ACKNOWLEDGEMENTS

This book might not have been possible without the people and institutions named here.

First and foremost is a peculiar institution to which many scholars my age owe a debt, and yet I have never seen it acknowledged. I mean the Cold War. The Pentagon colonels who decided that training young GI's to become translators was a wise use of manpower, the legislators who voted tax money to support language study so that a few Americans would know the language of any country we decided to make our enemy, the administrators whose paperwork yielded checks for GI Bill recipients, Fulbright scholars or what not, all were even more basic to my education in Chinese than the actual teachers and schools who taught me. A US government agency not part of the Cold War complex was the National Endowment for the Humanities, which funded one of my years of research in the far east.

The Institute of Far Eastern Languages (IFEL) at Yale, as wantonly destroyed by the wilfulness of Kingman Brewster as ever was any ancient statue by a mad mullah, was a marvel of efficient and deeply effective language teaching, thanks mostly to its moving genius, Robert Tharp, but also to the patience and dedication of the instructors whose lot in life was to make Chinese-speakers of an endless procession of eighteen-year-old American boys. One of those instructors was Parker Huang, a native Cantonese-speaker whose Mandarin was more than good enough to qualify him to teach it; he offered an optional course in Cantonese to Air Force students of whom a dozen or so of us took it. After a few weeks the class had dwindled to me alone, and at that point it somehow changed from a language course to one in T'ang poetry, on which he was a notable expert. A year at IFEL taught me that studying Chinese, if properly done, is as hard work as digging ditches, but also that an alert digger can find gold and diamonds.

In operational training I came under the aegis of George Sing, whose idea of training you for a job was to set you to doing it. While struggling with low-level cryptanalysis under his helpful supervision, I was persuaded against my sceptical inclination that it is possible to discover and learn the meaning of a word one had never heard of in a cryptic text in which one had not even suspected its existence. That was the best training I could imagine for textual analysis of dead languages.

After a tour of operational duty overseas, I was assigned to a training center. There it was decided that too little time remained of my enlistment to justify sending me through instructor training, so it looked as though I would sweep floors and run messages for those ten months until I met the third of my USAF angels, Charles Semich. He put me to work as curriculum clerk and factotum for the advanced course he and other experts were teaching. One day I replaced one in the classroom so he could keep a dentist's appointment, and from then on I was employed full time in teaching advanced translation to translators more experienced than I was. The first few weeks of that made ditch-digging seem easy, but by the time I returned to civilian life I had discovered that one could learn a subject by teaching it.

My dissertation advisors, Hugh Stimson and A.C. Graham, were among the few non-dogmatic sinologists I have met. Graham in particular I consider second only to Wang Li as premier sinologist of the twentieth century. My students at Berkeley in the 1970's taught me a great deal in their Socratic way, things I would not have learned otherwise.

The great textual scholars of the eighteenth and nineteenth centuries cleared away much of the rubbish and undergrowth that cluttered the texts that have survived from ancient China; I have tried to repay them by developing my own reading power to the point where I no longer need follow them blindly. The great translators into English, in particular Legge and Waley, provided models of subtlety and accuracy that I would not have considered attainable in the days when I churned out translations lickety-split on a military typewriter. Without the reconstructed Archaic Chinese of Bernhard Karlgren I would have found the Classical Chinese word-class problem much harder going, and might not have solved it at all.

With this book in particular I benefited from discussions of phonetics and phonology with my wife, Professor Mary Beckman of the Ohio State University, whose editorial skills also have made my prose less unintelligible. Myriad errors of my own remain. Credit entropy for them.

THE PROJECT

Earlier drafts of these notes have circulated for the past decade among longtime associates of mine who knew what I had been doing, how and why. When a former student put the previous edition of them on his website they became available to the general public, for whom background information might be helpful.

I call this the Comprehensive Classical Chinese Lexicon Project. It began in 1961 when I started keeping notes of Classical Chinese words. It moved closer to its present form of a database in 1967, when I substituted indexed 3 X 5 cards for looseleaf notebooks. That card catalog expanded through the 1970's, partly with the help of some of my students at the University of California, Berkeley, until it became unwieldy.

The advent of the personal computer facilitated the collection of vocabulary into a relational database. It began on an Apple II in 1979, into which I entered data from those cards. But at 1 MHz clock speed, 48K memory and 50K floppy disk capacity, that machine could neither hold much data nor search it very effectively. The software was my own, written partly in BASIC and partly in 6502 assembly language. That was version 1.

Porting version 1 to a CP/M machine with two 8-inch floppies with 1 MB capacity gave version 2, which also used homemade software. Version 3 used commercial software running under DOS 2.2 on a PC XT clone with 20 MB hard drive. Version 3 ran faster on a 33 MHz 486 machine under DOS 3.3. Porting to Windows 3.1 on the same machine made version 4, the first in which, thanks to a program called Fontmonger, I could display and print Chinese graphs, as well as the GSR romanization in its own typeface. Installing the Japanese-language versions of Windows and Paradox made version 5, the first one that allowed me to display and print thousands of Chinese graphs (using their Japanese readings as keyboard input). Porting to Access from Paradox made version 6. Version 7 returned to English-language Windows using TwinBridge Chinese Partner, a program that despite its many shortcomings tripled the number of Chinese graphs I could display and print.

In 1998 I first circulated a printed collection of my notes (I had been printing drafts for my own use since 1994). By then I had enough words to begin the second stage of the project, in which I looked for plausible sets of comparands. I found several hundred sets, enough to convince me that the classical historical-comparative method of philology could be applied to old Chinese despite the phonetic opacity of its script. Conversion to Unicode and addition of Konjaku Mojikyo led to more new versions, and the word-collection of the first stage continued through that in parallel with the word-collation of the second stage.

The third stage of the project is now under way; it requires that the texts themselves be entered in a database, divided into utterances within which each word is identified both by lexical identity and by local function. I have begun by providing a translation for each text, done to a uniform standard. But I avoid the usual approach of translating one text at a time. Instead I move around from text to text, concentrating on a particular word or idiom or turn of phrase as I find it in any text. The result will be that I will not have a finished translation of any one text for years to come. (Some texts on which I have been working for decades, such as 國語, 呂氏春秋, 論衡, 淮南子, and 戰國策 are well along by now, but I see no reason to rush any of them. The integrity of the project's method requires that the entire corpus be treated as a single body of data, which means that technically speaking no text will have been properly translated until all have been.)

Stage one, the collection of vocabulary, and stage two, the collation of vocabulary into sets of comparands, now go much more slowly, since advances in them depend on feedback from stage three. That has reduced the addition of new vocabulary to these notes to a trickle. The philological work goes slowly (as of course it must if conducted with due caution) while the lexicographic work attendant on translating texts proceeds apace. I had thought to issue addenda and corrigenda to the previous edition as separate files because in the layout of previous drafts the formatting made it laborious to fit a new entry in without uglifying the page beyond my tolerance. I have since come across a few tricks of formatting and layout that reduce white space and allow insertion of new entries quickly with little or no disruption.

This edition adumbrates my first major step toward a fundamental reworking of Karlgren's Archaic Chinese, namely the elimination of initial clusters. Also, the dictionary portion of volume I is now more than half again as large as in the previous edition. This expansion comes less from new words than from addition of citations from CC texts showing usage of the words. Most citations are entered more than once, but if each is counted only once, ignoring duplications, the quantity of translated CC cited here approaches a hundred thousand words. That may be only of the order of one percent of the total extant text from the period, but since it consists of utterances taken from many texts to illustrate a wide variety of words it should be enough to give aspirant readers a fair choice of windows through which to examine the corpus. Even those hopelessly mired in the nineteenth-century mode of "reading characters" might be able to benefit from these examples.

In addition to the brief excerpts I favored in previous editions, in this one I have added longer excerpts, as well as a few self-contained anecdotes and medium-length poems each entered under the name of a person with whom it is associated. I divide the anecdotes into manageable chunks, and further subdivide those chunks as illustrative citations redundantly entered under noteworthy words they contain. This allows scope for learners to practice the reading of connected CC text with the aid of this type of dictionary while letting them cross-check their own work. I also give, in appendix 4 to volume I, an example of the practical use of comparands in resolving the apparent vagueness of mimetic binomes into something more specific than what can be had from most commentators. I have made changes and additions to the tables of comparands and phonetic elements, corrected a few errors and omissions in the 反切 tables, and entirely rewritten the introduction to show my materials and methods and their factual and procedural justifications in more detail.

Two things have gradually impressed themselves on me as this work has progressed. One is the surprising power of the seemingly very simple method of cross-comparison in search of regularities as applied to a database of a textual corpus of a dead language. Others wiser than I will no doubt have recognized this all along, but I have found that being able to ask not just What does this word mean? but other questions like What other words mean something like this one? and What other words sound similar to this one? and What other words show syntactic behavior like this one? and even vaguer inquiries like What other words remind you of this one? amounts, in practice, to being able to address queries to a native speaker—or rather in this case an early draft of a primitive mockup of a crude approximation of a virtual native speaker. Other linguists may be able to go much farther in this direction in Classical Chinese.

The other thing that impresses me is the growing validation, emerging like a fossil under chisel and brush, of the traditional view of old Chinese as severely monosyllabic and uninflected. I approached this investigation not just willing but eager to find inflection, derivation, affixes, ablaut, agglutination, teratogenic hyperpolysynthesis—any device reported to have been used in any language at any time or place will find welcome in my picture of CC so long as I see good evidence for it. I see no more evidence for any of them now than I did forty years ago, and on one tenet for which I was firmly in the anti-traditionalist camp, that of the existence of polysyllabic roots in proto-Chinese, wave upon wave of evidence has forced me back until now it seems that even George Kennedy's classic examples, words like butterfly and bat, are compounded of monosyllables. (I hasten to add that they are not synonym-compounds, and I remain unconvinced that there are no polysyllabic roots whatever.)

This work is no less "in-progress" now than it has been. If the previous edition might be regarded as twenty percent advanced toward its goal, this edition would still be less than twenty-five percent.

Little progress has been made on the sorting-out of dialects that must be done before etymologies can even be attempted. Work on comparands of mimetics, promising as it seems, is just beginning. Species and artifacts are still mostly ill-identified. Some assignments of comparands that were made early in the second phase of the project should since then have been altered in the light of further evidence, but have not been. Add to that that in dozens of cases it appears an errant mouse-click must have sent a word to a destination other than what I had meant it for, and you have, if not an utter jumble, at least a few sets of comparands whose labeling must be taken with caution. If I had time to sort them out, it would not surprise me to find hundreds of words assigned to blatantly unsuitable comparand-sets. My proofreading is no better than it was, so be alert for mipsrints.

These are still, as they have always been, my own private notes addressed to myself for my own use. Nonetheless, the additions I have made are substantial enough to justify my suggesting that, despite their errors and omissions, these notes have advanced to a point at which they can be the reference of first resort for readers of Classical Chinese who know English. Rough and gappy as they still are, they are for the most part a better source of lexical information than the dictionaries we have been using. A claim of that sort ought to be subject to critical review, and accordingly I now open these notes to citation and public criticism. The stipulation that this work is not to be cited without permission has been removed from the copyright notice of this edition.

John Cikoski, Saint Mary's October 2008

[June 2009] Draft seven of version fourteen is the last edition of these notes that will be issued in the form of a book. Traditional books are inefficient at conveying the mass and variety of information a modern reader of CC needs; it is past time to enter the hyperlink era. This edition differs little from the one of October 2008: some errors, egregious or subtle, have been rectified, loose ends of discussion have been tied up, and a few hundred words and a few dozen pages of examples have been added. Only volume one has been updated; the comparands in volume two and English index in volume three are obsolete beyond the power of addenda and corrigenda to repair.

[December 2009] Layout & proofreading redone, 21 pages of notes & citations added.

[August 2010] Same version, 14.7. No new philology. 77 pages of newly added citations.

[March 2011] Same version, 14.7. Errors, omissions & infelicities corrected. Many new citations, including long excerpts sliced & diced for cross-reference.

A note on romanization

I romanize modern standard Chinese in pinyin with tone marks thus: First tone is $\bar{\quad}$, second tone is $\acute{\quad}$, third tone $\check{\quad}$, fourth tone $\grave{\quad}$. To refer to sinologists' readings of Classical Chinese in Mandarin I follow their current custom of using pinyin without tone marks; for that limited purpose I use sans serif type. My own use of Mandarin readings of Classical Chinese words is limited to proper names and technical terms that casual readers might encounter in sinological works for the general public. Since most such have used the Wade-Giles without tone marks that was standard for a century, I follow that convention, so present-day sinologists' Xunzi is my Hsün-tzu; their Chunqiu is my Ch'un-ch'iu. For such names and terms I give romanization followed by Chinese graphs on their first occurrence; for subsequent occurrences I give only the Chinese graphs.

To romanize Classical Chinese I use the idiosyncratic quasi-phonetic alphabet of Bernhard Karlgren (see below p. xxxvi). For phonetic representation of other languages I use the International Phonetic Alphabet.

TO THE READER OVER MY SHOULDER

These vocabulary notes are addressed to a young enlisted man in the US Air Force. Trained intensively in spoken and written Mandarin, he was dispatched to various Americanized mudholes in eastern Asia, assigned a desk and typewriter and told to turn Chinese into English at twenty words a minute for eight hours a day. This cog in the cold war machine grew curious about the history of the language he had been issued as a weapon, and in course he found H.G. Creel's Literary Chinese By The Inductive Method.^a When he saw that the way he read modern Chinese bore no relation to the learned professor's method of reading ancient texts, he wondered how a language that had to be hacked into along Creel's thorny jungle trail could be related to the one he marched through at quick step every day. That GI is of course myself fifty years ago.

I began these notes while teaching myself to read Classical Chinese (CC). They are part of a general inquiry into Chinese texts and inscriptions prior to AD 601, using a database of such texts to reconstruct the grammar, phonology and lexicon of Old Chinese along axes of variation including diachronic change and dialect difference. They focus on texts from the Warring States period and Han dynasty, ie from ca 400 BC to AD 200, or in named texts, from the Ch'un-ch'iu 春秋 to the Shih Ming 釋名. To key the analysis to the texts I have compiled vocabulary tables. The vocabulary in them is far from complete, less than half its ultimate size, but the notes may be usable by others with caution.

The first volume of the lexical notes is a very rough draft of a dictionary; it contains:

- 24,000 words (including proper names) with English glosses and Chinese graphs
- Archaic Chinese readings for those words, reconstructed according to the system in Grammata Serica Recensa^b (briefly GSR) and listed alphabetically by articulation-class of initial
- for many words, my modified Archaic reading, word-class label,^c Kuang Yün 廣韻 rime class (for 廣韻, see below, p. xviii), reference to comparands (Matisoff's term for words similar enough in sound and meaning to suggest etymological relationship), or illustrative citations
- lists of abbreviations, texts cited, extensions to GSR and examples of comparands of mimetics

I append most citations to more than one word, giving 30,000 tokens of 8500 types. I follow the OED in citing distinct senses and usages under subheadings. I am not yet able to give dates for citations. The source of each citation is given by a graph referring to appendix I. I give no etymologies, which will take years more work, but have been lavish with comparands.

The second volume tabulates information about the script and vocabulary; it contains:

- a table of 214 dictionary radicals
- a table of 540 primitives in Shuo Wên Chieh Tzū 說文解字 (for 說文解字, see below, p. xix)
- a table of graphs sorted by phonetic graph-elements, with a list of head graphs
- a list in radical order of graphs proposed for an all-CC font for e-texts
- lists of 廣韻 syllables in rime-book order, in radical order of initial fan-ch'ieh 反切 graph, in radical order of final 反切 graph and in GSR-alphabetic order (for 反切, see below, p. xviii)
- a table of 12,000 words in 700 sets of comparands, with a list of rubrics

The third volume indexes the first two volumes; it contains:

- a stroke count index to graphs in definitions, with GSR readings
- an English index to definitions with cross-reference to the table of comparands

Use with caution

Anyone with a basic reading knowledge of Chinese may find these notes usable, but not all will be found useful. Their occasional compilation over decades left some in a slapdash state, and they have many typographical errors. Working toward definitions based on research for which these notes hold data, I have used as stopgaps the glosses of Chinese scholiasts (and the sinologists who follow them like a line of ducklings) that mislead even experienced readers (see below, p. xxviii). If no text is cited for a word defined here, the definition is tentative, a placeholder for a real definition to come; or the word itself may come to be rejected as unattested. My own considered definitions are not all complete and accurate. Important problems lurk unsolved in them. Many names of objects in the material culture or creatures in the natural world need more work on specificity; it suffices at this stage to gloss them as “kind of basket”, “kind of bird”, and the like. Not every graph found in texts is in these notes. They include some not in the K’ang Hsi dictionary 康熙字典 (briefly 康熙字典) but they cannot yet replace that vade mecum. I normalize all reconstructed readings to modified Archaic Chinese, so these notes give pronunciations for some words for a time at which their existence is not attested. For my research, this is in order; for reading a text in its own language, it can be misleading.

What is Classical Chinese?

Classical Chinese is a family of languages spoken and written in northern and central China during the 6th through 3rd centuries BC, now known only in writing. (It shows varying continuity with much writing through the 6th century AD, which is CC in a looser sense.) Early China was ruled from walled cities by a warrior aristocracy who fought each other from horse-drawn chariots with composite bows. Before that, China was inhabited for millennia by village-dwelling farmers raising grain, vegetables, pigs and chickens on rich land irrigated by channels they dug and maintained with stone tools. Comparative anthropology suggests that the chance that the neolithic farmers invented those bows and chariots—and the walled cities their use prompted—on their own is as near zero as anything can be in human experience. They were brought to China from the west and used to conquer and subjugate the farmers. The pattern occurs over and over, of warriors from the edge of the steppe conquering the agricultural civilization to their east or south, then adopting civilized ways to a degree that made them vulnerable to the next wave. Thus we should ask how much influence the language spoken by the conquerors had on the indigenous languages. (In a comparable case, Norman French had influence on English out of proportion to the number of Normans who went to England after the conquest. Similarly, some common words in Mandarin stem from Mongol.)

Our earliest linguistic evidence in China is inscriptions on shell and bone made at the great city Shang in the second millennium BC. They are written in characters that resemble those in which CC was written, and many of them can be sensibly interpreted by reading them as CC. The chance that that script was devised by the conquerors is also near zero. Writing is as useless to migratory herdsmen as fancy horsemanship is to farmers. Did the rulers for whom those divinations were recorded speak the language in which they were recorded? And how was that related to the language spoken by the farmers? The makers of those inscriptions, whom we misleadingly call the Shang dynasty, were conquered by another wave of barbarians from the west, whom we misleadingly call the Chou dynasty, who also made inscriptions, ones that seem to be in a different language from that of the shell and bone inscriptions, though a closely related one. The Chou language looks to me more different from

CC than the Shang language. The view of those three as a simple historical procession analogous to Latin→Vulgar Latin→Italian is one I can no longer accept. I reject the simplifying assumption that CC is descended from the language of the Shih 詩 (Book of Odes, or Odes) in the sense that my own English is descended from that of Chaucer. The textual history of the Odes is murky and its poems are of heterogeneous origin, but they are quoted so often in CC texts that we must allow for their influence on the CC vocabulary. Lacking proper historical and linguistic analysis, early inscriptions can be of little use to help us read CC texts. I include nothing in the Shu 書 (Shang Shu 尚書 Book of Documents) in the CC corpus.

We have indirect and direct evidence (see below, p. xxii) of regional variants of CC. The language of the texts shows some but not much variation. It was a koiné, perhaps from Shang language with admixture of other languages, probably learned as part of education in basic literacy and spoken with local accents. As a reasonable guess the languages of North China differed roughly as much as modern Romance languages. If so then spoken koiné could have been acquired easily. We know hardly more about languages of the Yangtze valley than about Hsiung-nu. The Li Sao 離騷 is in CC koiné with a Ch'ü 楚 accent, not, I think, typical 楚 language.

CC grammar is mostly the interaction of lexical properties of uninflected words with patterns of syntax and their transformations. There is a very limited morphology of two sorts. First is the use of a few grammaticised words, traditionally called empty words, that when attached to full words generate phrases with different lexical properties from the full words. There is evidence, both from the prosody of verse and from a phonological effect called fusion, that in some cases this attachment was close enough to resemble affixation. Second is a phenomenon in which two words of related meaning have a phonetic contrast that appears later as a difference of syllable-tone.³ For example, 去 k'iab read in what became the second tone in Ancient Chinese is “remove” but read in what became the third AC tone is “depart; depart from.” We do not yet know if this is derivation, dialect mixture or both. (A graphic device called hanging a bell is sometimes used to indicate this tone difference: an arc of a circle is added to one corner of the graph, upper left indicating 1st AC tone, lower left 2nd tone, upper right 3rd tone and lower right 4th tone. The two readings of 去 just mentioned can thus be distinguished as 去 and 去. These pedagogic symbols are of post-classical origin and are not found in most editions of CC texts, though they are helpfully present in Legge's.)

The word-class system of CC is elegantly simple and regular. There are no inflections, no government or agreement, no tense, number or case. Mood, aspect and voice are expressed by idiom, not by a modified verb. Class-membership shows in contrasting semantic regularities in a paradigmatic set of syntactic contexts. To wit, nouns differ from verbs in the regular semantic contrast they show in the function of adjunct. A noun like 人 ñièn “people” as adjunct regularly means “of people,” as in 人事 “human affairs”. A verb like 小 siòg “to be small” as adjunct regularly means “that-is-small” as in 小事 “minor affairs.” Rummaging texts will reveal a consistent relation of nouns like 人 in constructions like 人事 to constructions like 人有事 “people have affairs.” Verbs like 小 in constructions like 小事 turn out to have a consistent relation to constructions like 事小 “the affairs are minor.” Several sub-classes of verb contrast in such contextual paradigms. Two such are ergative verbs and neutral verbs. A neutral verb has its subject as agent whether or not an object is present. With an ergative verb the presence or absence of an object reverses the direction of the agent-patient relationship. That is, with a neutral verb like 食 ḍiək “eat,” an utterance like 人食犬

“people eat dogs” relates consistently to 人食 “people eat,” while with an ergative verb like 服 b'ǐāk “submit | subdue,” an utterance like 犬服 “dogs submit” relates consistently to 人服犬 “people make dogs submit.” In practice, CC can show as much subtle complexity as any other language, but through it all these word-classes are reliable.

These regularities went unnoticed by sinology, partly due to sinologists' equating Chinese characters to words in their own languages like beginning language-learners (see below, p. x), but also in part because they have been misled by the terminology they adopted from European language-study. There the word verb is used to label both a word-class, denoting permanent properties that a word retains out of context, and a syntactic function, denoting adventitious properties that a word acquires relative to others in context of a particular utterance. I call this syntactic function nucleus, reserving verb to label the word-class. There is no obscurity about saying that a noun may be a nucleus. Sinologists perpetuate confusion by claiming that in CC a noun may be a verb and so there are no word-classes. (A few have begun to observe the distinction between class and function, but without distinctive terminology.^a)

The required component of a nuclear sentence, the principal type of CC sentence, is a word or phrase with the function of nucleus (a subject is optional). The nucleus may be negated with 不 piǔg and may have the aspectual final particle 矣 ziǎg. The nucleus may be either a noun or a verb, or it may consist of two elements, an object preceded by its factor. Both factor and object may be either a noun or a verb. The object may be replaced by the pronoun 之 ŋǎg. For more detail, see the dictionary entries in this volume for 不, 矣 and 之.

Another type of sentence is the appositional sentence, with no nucleus. Its required components are a B-term and a final particle, of which the unmarked one, 也 dǐa, is most common. Often but not always, a preceding A-term is found in apposition with the B-term. Both A-term and B-term may be either a noun or a verb or a phrase with some internal structure. This type of sentence is negated by 非 piwər. (See dictionary entries for 非 and 也.)

Fixed word-order is a bedding-stone of CC syntax. In phrase structure, subject precedes nucleus, factor precedes object and adjunct precedes head. There is no freedom of word placement in CC; departures from formulas of phrase structure are by transformational formulas, all of which have semantic effect on the transformed sentence. Common examples are left-shifting and left-shifting with deixis, both of which add emphasis to the left-shifted word or phrase. (See below, pp. li-lii; for more detail, see Cikoski 1970 & 1978.)

Classical Chinese is not wényán

CC resembles wényán 文言, the jargon of scholar-bureaucrats of recent centuries, a linguistic anomaly like law French in England. It was not spoken, and if read aloud would have been hard to understand by one unfamiliar with the subject of the text being read. It evolved, I think, in the Ming as a reaction against the non-Chinese administrators imposed by the Yüan (in some ways like the gǔwén 古文 reaction in the Tang) and was rigidified under the Ch'ing. Schooling began with memorizing the classics, followed by composition larded with quotations from the classics. Nothing I would call literature is written in this style of prose. Literary works I have seen from the Ming and Ch'ing were, like those of earlier eras, written either in vernacular or in imitation of older styles that had originally been vernacular. The term wényán^b was also loosely applied to Classical Chinese which, as a source of wényán, shared much of its vocabulary and idiom. To call wényán Literary Chinese is misleading; it is not the same sort of ^a E.g. Dan Robins, “Mass Nouns and Count Nouns in Classical Chinese”, Early China 25 (2000), pp. 147-184.

^b Sinologists persisted for a century in calling it wēnlǐ, a term never applied to it by the Chinese.

thing as Literary English or Literary French, which refer to works like Rasselas or L'Avare that are still largely accessible without special language training.

CC has been claimed to be not a representation of speech but a directly-encoded representation of ideas. Moreover, it is said that all wényán uses the same idea-code. This claim fails. Modern European examples show that an artificial language will not find extensive practical use. Had the graphs begun as ideographs, they would have been co-opted to write real language so soon as to have left little trace of such an origin.

Record-keeping has been a tool of government in China for millennia, since before bureaucratism began to be equated with classical language in the conventional wisdom. (In the first century AD, Wang Ch'ung 王充 noted that bureaucrats studied bureaucratic rather than Confucian texts, and knew little of the classics, while Confucians were ignorant of administrative matters.) The inefficiency of requiring its clerks to learn a new code of ideas rather than to read and write their own language would have doomed any regime in the cutthroat competition of pre-dynastic China, as also in that from Han to Sui. Even under the Ch'ing much work was done by clerks who had passed only a low-level examination, or none at all. Advanced graduates were fast-tracked to the policy level.

What kind of lexicon?

Lexicology is to linguistics somewhat as engineering is to science. It is said a lexicographer must record how people do use words rather than how they ought to use them. That is not to be pushed to the point where speakers' confusing words like compose and comprise is held to imply that compose and comprise are synonyms. A lexicon is not just a linguist's field notes in alphabetic order. A lexicographer should note that careful users object to such confusions.

I hope to provide instructive definitions and illuminating examples for readers of CC texts. But readers range from those like Ezra Pound to those like Arthur Waley. Waley is my model of a good reader. Pound is a warning to us of how bad a reader one can be who is intelligent and studious and consults the best authorities. Pound is also a model reader: he provides examples of misreadings I would not have imagined, and inspires me to seek definitions that reject such misreadings. I aim at a lexicon for aspiring readers like eg I.F. Stone, who taught himself Classical Greek to research the trial of Socrates. To teach oneself CC now would take decades. That is not inevitable. The script would not be the barrier it has been if instead of having to learn the writing without its language, one could learn CC so that reading it one could hear it in one's mind.

No dictionary of any language can avoid fallacies inherent in the very idea of a lexicon. We can only try to minimize the practical effects of these limitations. Consider the illusion of the snapshot, the impossibility of insulated inquiry and the artificial isolation of the word. We cannot get a static picture of a language like a drawing of a statue. The language develops during the time taken to describe it; the lexicographer also changes. Still, a dictionary that labels words as obsolete or jargon or dialect is more valuable than one that simply sets them out in rows like kewpies. Few words in Chinese character dictionaries are labeled as dialectal, fewer as jargon and none as obsolete. We are more likely to find a word that never existed than to be informed that one is no longer used; at most that would be implied by a remark of the sort, "This a is what we now call b."

How one phrases a question about a stone does not alter the stone. Inquiry about words is not so insulated. Some alternate readings for graphs in 廣韻 (see below, p. xviii) suggest to me that their presence is due to the question having been asked not, "Is some word pronounced X?” but, “What graph can be given reading X to fill a place in the rime table?” Were such readings imported from dialects? Dug out of old poetry and assumed to rime in a scheme not used by the old poet? Perhaps some are sandhi-readings, or abstracted from a syntactic context that altered the reading from the citation-form? Or even coined for the purpose, in the manner of Hyman Kaplan? In cases where the essential information of who said it that way, when, and in what context is unavailable, we lack firm grounds for saying that graph a in reading X writes a real word in citation form, not just a sound that fills a gap in a pattern.

Isolation of words from their language is no virtue. As an English speaker you know many distinct senses of shell. Reading Clemens was shelled in the third, you think of batters hitting baseballs, not cannon firing projectiles. You do not think of a piecrust or a jacket or a spoon or a rowboat, although given shell in other contexts those are just what you would think of. This is part of what we mean by saying that you know the word shell.

Learning words is not mastering language. Language-learners equate foreign words with words in their own language, misleading them to say risible or incomprehensible things. Later, distinct equations are made. No English speaker learning Spanish gato “cat” would guess that in Mexico gato means the tool that raises a car to change tires. These two are learned as distinct items. Most learners never pass this stage however many more isolated words and potted idioms they may add to their vocabulary. (Jerzy Kurilowicz said of Roman Jakobson, “He speaks fluently Russian in six languages.”) A few acquire a genuine command of their new language, so that they can coin new uses for shell which seem natural to native speakers who know that an air of standoffishness is the same thing as the integument of an egg and the same thing as a gutted building. They know the word shell.^a

I think no one has a genuine command of any form of old Chinese in that sense. Most sinologists are between the first and second stages, and it is assumed that the second stage is the utmost attainable. Modern readers of CC—including Chinese sinologists—translate each graph or digraph into a word in a modern language and then think in terms of those words. We must understand a word in many contexts in its own language to get its force in any given context. This cannot be done by za-zen on the “meaning of the character”. We need usage examples of the word. To read a text as it was written, it helps to know how a word is used in its contexts; providing annotated sets of such contexts can be most useful in a lexicon of a dead language.

Common sense about Chinese writing

Alphabets are efficient ways to record speech. The idea of an alphabet is the germ of dozens of ways of writing a language, all learnable as systems in much less time than it takes to learn the languages they write. Syllabaries are hardly less efficient if the number of distinct syllables is not large. In Old Chinese it is. Over 3800 syllables are distinguished in 廣韻, and Archaic Chinese had more. That would be a burden if each syllable had one symbol, but in Chinese writing we find the inventory multiplied ten-fold. It is the worst script in the world, save only one, and that one is derived from it. (I mean of course the one Sir George Sansom called “surely without inferiors”,^b the monumental junk-sculpture of a script that the Japanese have made by remorseless bricolage of Chinese books.)

^a Much use of language is by prentice speakers. (This is one of few plausible explanations of the existence of “areal features”.) Even adult native speakers misapprehend technical vocabulary. Computer specialists annoy mathematicians by using the word mantissa in a way they consider as illegitimate as calling π an integer. Designers of Asian fonts crimped the word radical to refer to any graphic element, not just the 214 that have been selected to head sections of dictionaries. Tarmac is often misapplied, as is epicenter. Roy Miller’s joke about loan-words in Japanese holds in a more general context: that in some cases when we say a word was “borrowed” it would be more accurate to say “kidnapped and ravished.”

^b Historical Grammar of Japanese, Oxford UP 1928, p. 44

Readers of old Chinese texts must fix in mind that Chinese graphs were not devised to allow readers in later times to apprehend their meaning without knowing Old Chinese. The assumption that graphs have meanings independent of language,^a that can be looked up and cobbled together as a do-it-yourself kit of the text, underlies many of the mistakes one can make in this pursuit.^b (Ulterior motives abound. David Bergamini, who took a dislike to the city of Liaoyang, renders the graphs 遼陽 for its name as “Far-from-the-sun^c.”)

Writing carries information by conveying speakers’ utterances to other speakers in their common language. In the science of linguistics the utterance is what is primary, not its written representation. A shipowner got a note from a captain: Owen to the blockhead—the vig is spilt. Knowing the captain’s accent, the owner read: Owing to the blockade, the voyage is spoilt. Without that knowledge of the captain’s language the owner would have been like a modern reader of CC asking, “What does this character mean?” To look up blockhead while ignoring blockade in varied pronunciations would have been an unintended irony.

A second point: each Chinese graph represents one syllable of spoken Chinese. This is a minority opinion. Received opinion is that each graph writes a distinct word with its own meaning. That is plausible—after all, each graph has its own place and definition in Chinese dictionaries. We are taught that graphs originated as drawings of things, and if you squint hard enough you can make out the likeness. What could look more like salt than 鹵? Diehards say each graph encloses a nugget of meaning, like the pork ball in a potsticker. Moderates grant each a pronunciation that distinguishes it from most other graphs when read aloud. But the one-graph-one-word doctrine is hard to sustain when applied to texts. (Demarcating empty words^d (above, p. vii) did not help the doctrine, but did create a new publisher’s category, dictionaries that give the meanings of the meaningless words.) The more one insists on one-graph-one-word, the less likely that one can read old Chinese without bogging down.

Advanced opinion accepts disyllabic words, but the practical effect of this concession is to admit digraphs to the list of word-symbols. It allows dumplings to stick together,^e some merging to share a porkball, while others can be pried apart. Examples from English show what happens then. On ships a hawser goes through a hawsehole. Etymology derives hawser from a French word meaning “hoister” while hawsehole is indeed hawse + hole, from a Norse word for “neck.” In a character dictionary we could only enter hawser under hawse. We can add significs like “fiber” for hawser and “boat” for hawsehole to the symbols for these syllables, but that leaves intact the notion fostered by the script that the hawse of hawser is a word. Consider crawdad, a variant of crawfish. Accepted etymology is OHG krebiz “crab” → MF crevice → ME crevis → E crayfish ~ crawfish → crawdad. Sinology has neither tools nor methods for discovering or verifying this sort of etymology, and even if it did, crawdad and crawfish still have to go under craw in a Chinese-style lexicon. But craw is a non-word;

^a For example, A Dictionary of Chinese Buddhist Terms by W.E. Soothill & Lewis Hodous (London: Kegan Paul 1937) gives no Chinese readings for its Chinese terms, although Sanskrit and Pali readings are cited freely.

^b If one persists in this approach long enough to discover that it makes the Chinese sages appear to be talking twaddle, it saves face to claim that twaddle is a superior brand of sense, of which the uninitiated can have no appreciation. The logic is, “Wittgenstein is profound; he is hard to understand. I have more trouble understanding Lao-tzū, therefore...” I suspect it is this approach that makes the first chapter of Fire in the Lake so silly, in contrast to the clarity and wisdom of the rest of the book. Fitzgerald seems to be to be trying to convey the impression that she has arrived at a philosopher’s understanding of Confucianism, when she has only acquired a student’s swotted-up command of the terminology. Even knowing no Chinese, a little scepticism might have saved her from so much sappy sinology; but would Fire in the Swamp have sold fewer copies?

^d For example, Legge says of the graph 惟: “...it is hardly susceptible of translation, and we may content ourselves with saying that it is an initial particle. Here we may call it, now; there it is simply as the note which a man gives when he clears his throat preparatory to speaking.”—The Chinese Classics, vol. 3, The Shoo King, p. 677. One marvels at the comprehensiveness of a set of ideographs which even has one for ahem.

^e A scientific fact known to the ancients: 釋名: 餌而也相黏而也. “Dumpling is sticky; they stick to each other.”

we have no text in which a crustacean is called a craw. An alphabet can display that as craw*-. A Chinese graph might be modified to that end, but I have not seen it done.

Third: we learn nothing of the meaning or history of words by analyzing graphs. The Chinese speak as they do and spoke as they did for reasons found in their speech itself; how they write, except when writing pastiche, derives from how they speak. The legend of an “ideographic language” is false; reading Chinese is not grokking images of a man standing by his words or a woman kneeling under a roof or a bear riding a skateboard through a dentist’s office or whatever. Some purveyors of this moonshine conflate Chinese with written Japanese. A glance into a Japanese-English kanji dictionary shows the pitfalls that lie on that road. Example: “Hirohito...chose [the nengō] of Showa, Peace Made Manifest. Its ideographs carried something of the force of ‘millennium in which men shall speak with tongues’.”^a This is from analysis of the graphs 昭和. (The usual translation “Enlightened Peace” is better rendered “Displaying Unity”. There is also a pun on 和 that makes it mean, “We will show how Japanese we can be.”) To catch that sort of nuance you have to know the language. Analyzing ideographs yields only the artifacts of your imagination.

Achilles Fang praised Ezra Pound’s farcical translation of 惟義所在 as only that bird-hearted equity make timber and lay hold of the earth, expressing reservation only about his “compromise with popular etymology”.^b Few sinologists go to that extreme; even those who translate 拜 as “put the hands together” do not render 曰 as “stick out the tongue” or 尾 as “sit on a feather.” But the legend was explicitly endorsed by Joseph Needham. Discussing “pseudo-sciences”^c he says, “Glyphomancy (chhe tzu) is a very curious game, which could only have arisen in a culture with an ideographic language. It consisted in dissecting the written characters of personal and other names, with a view to making prognostications from them.”^d “Could only have” implies no counter-examples. But dissection of a word is common in English; vide this analysis of expert: “An X is an unknown quantity and a spurt is a drip under pressure.” Written English words lend themselves to “glyphomancy” also, as when therapist is analyzed as the rapist. A kind of puzzle clue works by such analysis, eg two much-quoted ones by Torquemada, panorama: “an orphan has neither,” and domain: “inciteful to matricide.”

Needham’s analysis of 觀 “observe” is “It combines Rad. 147, which indicates ‘seeing’, with a graph which in its most ancient form was a drawing of a bird, probably a heron. The meaning contained in the word, therefore, was essentially to observe the flight of birds...”^e He gives 11 pages of “Ideographic Etymologies of some of the words important in scientific thinking”.^f If “ideographic etymology” is nonsense one would expect to see some far-fetched derivations; this list is packed with them. Nor is it improved by including words that were not even in Classical Chinese (是 “is”) or that never were at all (是 “existence”). He draws serious conclusions from this game of glyphognosis or whatever, describing garb and gestures of shamans thousand of years ago from analysis of graphs like 𠂇 and 𠂆.^g

Fourth: the logographic theory is also invalid. A graph is not a word, just as a pointing finger is not the moon. A word may be written with a certain graph at a certain era, but in other eras that graph may write other words or that word be written with other graphs. If the common word diverges from the graph’s received readings, usually other graphs are pressed into service to write the everyday word while the former graph continues to be used, with its “literary” reading, to write an obsolete synonym used in pastiche and sometimes in pompous talk.

An example is the graph 也, now used to write the adverb 也 “also”. Its precursor wrote a final particle which is a pervasive feature of Classical Chinese, which appears suddenly from unknown—indeed, puzzling—antecedents. Precursors of 也 in Chou bronzes may correspond to later 匜 or 它 or 蛇; those in Yin bones may be modern 蚩. The Mandarin adverb may stem from a word written 亦 in older texts, while the CC final particle does not survive in Mandarin (though it might in other dialects). To reconstruct readings for this particle we need to know, not other words the graph 也 might have been used to write, but other graphs that might have been used to write the particle and its variants in the Classical Period. So graphs such as 邪 and 與 are directly relevant to our reconstruction of the word written 也 in CC, while earlier and later occurrences of the graph 也 are only tangentially relevant.

Words develop independently of writing, but writing can affect them, as witness the graph 弗. In Western Chou Chinese the final -t of 弗 was not a reduction of the object-pronoun 之; 之 is found in nuclei negated by 弗. In Eastern Chou Chinese, a distinct language, the preposed object-pronoun fused with the negative and the resulting monosyllable is written regularly with 弗. (The name-taboo of 孝昭帝 resulted in the replacement of many instances of 弗 with 不 in a historically anomalous reading pwət). When pronoun objects of negated factors were no longer preposed, the graph 弗 came to be viewed as a stylistic variant of 不, used especially when writing pastiche. Having been used in the classics allowed its continued use even after the words it wrote in the classics were no longer used.

Fifth: Chinese, like all languages, has diachronic and dialectal variation. Sinologists read old texts with faux-Peking pronunciation. (Imagine scholars of Roman texts twisting Latin into let’s-pretend Parisian, reading the name Augustus as oo!) They imply that all Chinese since the Shang era would have read these graphs as would any stroller in Tienanmen Square. (Well...sort of. Běijīng huà has tones. Sinological Pekinese is toneless.³)

Sixth: the reading given a graph by a writer who concocted it bears no necessary systematic relation to readings given for it by later lexicographers. They spoke different dialects at different eras and had no science of historical linguistics to inform their native-speaker intuitions. Look at readings and definitions in works like Chi Yün 集韻 and Chêng Tzū Tung 正字通, particularly with reference to the question of when two graphs with slightly different readings are interchangeable variants. You may agree that they cannot be implicitly relied on, and that to accept them uncritically is to make it impossible to do one’s own work any more carefully than they did, which was not carefully enough.

Graphs can acquire spurious readings. The graph 窞 p’ôg “pit” has a reading kôg through confusion with another graph 窖 used to gloss it. The graph 瑤, a variant of 瑤 ts’â, is now read què through misconstruing, perhaps by the compilers of the Chinese telegraphic code, of the notation 音闕 “No reading given,” in 康熙. The graph 墟 qū “rubble” is misread xu by sinologists who confuse it with 虛 xū “vacant”. A graph may write totally unrelated words. As signific-phonetic 眈 writes kăp “wink,” as dual-signific twən “sleepy.”

Sinology, traditional Chinese studies, is a bypassed island in academia. It holds a clerisy that distributes to its members prestige and money infused to it from the real world, ensuring that this kudos and cash go to insiders. Its organizing principle is a convention inherited from the Confucian literocracy, that seniors know everything and juniors may only learn it from seniors.³ Among its absurd claims are that Classical Chinese has no grammar and that Chinese graphs have meanings. The latter dogma especially baffles anyone who encounters it knowing how readily it can be shown that nothing is an intrinsic sign of anything, only held to be one by convention, and that no sign can have a meaning not given it by a perceiver, nor can it retain an assigned meaning out of context. (Consider a sign “OPEN” hanging in the window of a defunct business. The word open can be defined from its occurrences; this sign has no more meaning than a leaf hanging on a tree.) The former dogma is also false, and the persistence of the two reveals sinology as not an intellectual discipline. Its dogmas are ratchets that allow sinology to take from the world without giving to the world. That is sad, because there is much to be given. Scholars need better and easier access to Classical Chinese texts than sinology can provide.

Sinology has an onerous apprenticeship; the lawyers’ union is a walk-in by comparison. Sinologists know that the script and the examinations protected the privileges of the scholar-bureaucrat-landlord oligarchy in imperial China. Few see the analogous function in their own fiefdoms. There is also the pedagogy: CC is not taught as language, only as texts. The student must know some form of modern Chinese, typically Mandarin, and must recognize hundreds of graphs and be able to look others up. A text is plowed furrow by furrow, clod by clod. Commentaries are deciphered and translations are memorized. To read a paragraph can take a week; to read a book is the labor of years. It need not be so.

A key concept in sinology is to know a character. This comprises distinguishing it from other graphs (including writing it recognizably), associating it with a faux-Peking reading (pronouncing it recognizably is not crucial) and equating it with standard glosses in a modern language. A sinologist may ask of a student, “How many characters does he know?” This measures raw power, like asking of a football lineman, “How many pounds does he bench-press?” To qualify as knowing the character 師 (don’t write 師 or 師 or 帥!) one learns a reading shi (any ssh sound will do for all but precisians) and a meaning “teacher.” Additional meanings are “army,” “capital city,” and “blind.” Sinological character-meanings were laid down in the nineteenth century and can be misleading, eg 德 “virtue”; 凡 “generally”; 客 “guest”; 義 “righteous”; 桓公 “Duke Huan”; 安 “peace”; 智 “knowledge.”

Consider 草. To sinologists it is cao “grass.” The term includes hornwort, beggartick, pigfoot, burdock and thistle, but all are grass to sinology. This graph occurs in 草書 cǎoshū “flowing cursive script,” translated “grass writing.” Objecting that grass has nothing to do with it may get a wooden-headed reply of the sort, “That’s what the Chinese call it.” An expert might reply that 草 also means “rough.” Asked how this gracefully flowing calligraphy can be called rough, an expert may display a higher level of xylocephaly: “That’s the meaning of the character 草 in this context.” Sinologists might be open to discussing how rough is related to grass but they would think in terms of the words for rough and grass in their own language. Such discussions focus on “the meaning of the character” and consist of intensive semiotic analysis of a few cherry-picked examples. Much of what is called scholarship in sinology is only this, eg the endless march of proposals to replace “virtue” as the sinological meaning of 德.

Sinology defies philology. Yang Lien-sheng, one of the best ever in the field, whose work is still worth careful attention, says, “I wish to point out one thing that should be obvious; namely, that the student of Chinese history should be adequately equipped in philology. Lacking this requirement, the student may become an amateur in Chinese studies but never a sound Sinologist.”^a His examples show Karl Wittfogel mistranslating an inscription and Meng Sen not noticing that a citation of his text in another work has 十 instead of the 千 in the standard version. Neither illustrates philology. “Learn the language” and “verify the text” are not rules of philology but propaedeutica.

It was Yang’s own intelligence, informed by common sense and supplied by his vast reading, that gave his work value. To the extent that it is sinological it is anti-philological. The use of faux-Peking readings of graphs for the Chinese languages of all times and places flies in the face of the historical-comparative study that has been at the core of philology since the eighteenth century. Focus on the character as the vehicle of meaning, leaving only the most paltry role to analysis of the utterance, ignores methods basic in philology since the Renaissance. That a sinologist of Yang’s caliber did not even know what philology is betrays the intellectual poverty of the field in which he worked.

In Chinese as in all languages some words are related to others. That eludes sinology. It treats each character as an independent abstract entity.^b Sinological Pekinese obliterates information needed to approach the problem in any other way. A sinologist reading 蓬 as zha would not think of a possible etymological relation with 草 cao. Who reading them yong and ren could suspect that 用 and 任 might be cognate? Or 治 and 知; look how many zhi there are in a dictionary. Why single out these two? No sinologist would.

If the comparative approach then already in full operation in the scholarship of other languages had been applied to Chinese in the middle of the nineteenth century, by the end of that century when the neogrammarian reform came along sinology might have had a robust philological tradition ready to deal with it. Instead, it was not until the twentieth century that reconstructive work began, and then it centered not on language but on characters. The work I took up in 1967 should already have been well in hand by 1867.

The first serious methodical student to apply to the Chinese language the historical tools that had been developed for, and worked so well on, Indo-European was Julius Klaproth. Many of his findings are no longer accepted by linguists, but not because of faulty method. His initial assumptions precluded success before he began. Taking literally the biblical account of the flood, he assumed all the world’s languages could be traced to Noah’s family some five thousand years ago.^c Having assumed that, he proceeded to prove it to himself. In the process he laid the groundwork for the historical study of the languages of central and southeast Asia. By including Mandarin Chinese among the languages he compared, he made a second vitiating error: he assumed that it gave a clear reflection of Chinese around 3000 BC and so did not include other modern Chinese languages in the comparison.

Klaproth began on the right road, if with unsuitable baggage. The opening of China drew people who shifted western views of China from the idealization of the eighteenth century toward the condescension of the nineteenth and twentieth. The orientalism of traders, missionaries and functionaries pulled sinology off Klaproth’s road. To them China was a source of profit or of souls or of whatever it is that draws people to become bureaucrats. They brought with them the racial and social-class attitudes of their origins, which in expatriate isolation continued unexamined for generations until they had built up a body of “common knowledge” about China that was largely inaccurate, some preposterously so. It was from “China hands” or from Chinese who worked for them that early sinologists would have learned enough of the language to be able to proceed to independent work. But which Chinese language should they learn? For missionaries, the language of the people they would proselytize was indisputably needed, much of it language of low social status. Languages of treaty ports, such as Yüeh, Min and Wu, were needed by traders and their clerks. These “local dialects” were severely outranked by the one used by those who dealt with officials. The people who ranked highest among expatriates in China spoke Mandarin if they spoke any Chinese at all. And nearly all Chinese who had mastered traditional learning had done so in training to become mandarins.

Classical Chinese read aloud in Mandarin is unintelligible. People discussing a classical text often ask for characters or waggle a finger as if writing characters, signing a language-beside-a-language to rival the furigana that irked George Sansom^a. Many Chinese scholars surmised that the ancients must have pronounced differently from moderns. Some westerners saw this also. But, unlike philological scholarship in Europe, reconstructing a dead language would confer no prestige. Years of work would yield only another non-Mandarin dialect, like the jabber of muddy-legged peasants who could not even recognize simple characters. Mastery of the sinologists’ craft lay in knowing characters, beyond which they saw no need to go. In current parlance, the arcane script was not a bug but a feature.

Classical Chinese authors did not write characters. They wrote language in the slithery medium of phonetic syllable-graphs with significs. To read characters instead of language is to distort what they wrote. There is no easy way to mastery of a language. Sinology has always shied away from this hard truth, with the result that it is now little more than a sort of affinity group—“The Friends of Chinese Characters”—masquerading as an academic discipline.

Sinology is not a failed discipline; it never was a discipline at all. It was a congeries of ad hoc gimmicks for westerners dealing with the ruling classes of the Ch’ing empire. They never gave it the fundamental principles required by any genuine intellectual discipline. Sinologists choose to ignore that, or maybe just don’t notice it. Near the two hundredth anniversary of the start of Klaproth’s research and the hundredth of Karlgren’s, sinology stagnates, lagging farther and farther behind putative equivalent disciplines in other languages and literatures. In what follows I will suggest measures to bypass what has been a roadblock on the way to better understanding of early China. Traditional language study is at the core of these suggestions, as it should have been at the core of the study of old Chinese texts all these years.

The job and the tools

Philology is a massive subject. I can give only a sketch; a detailed treatment would fill a book.^b One of its basic principles is that we can reconstruct ancient pronunciations for historical comparison because sound change works unconsciously through tiny alterations in how the speech organs are moved. All languages constantly undergo such changes, and they happen the same way to the same sound regardless of what word it is in. These small changes can be context-dependent, but the context is a phonetic one, such as the presence or absence of accent in a syllable. Such alterations can of course be made under conscious control, as anyone who has learned another language in adulthood can attest, but this is not the case in the acquisition of one's native tongue as a child. If that were all, reconstruction would be simple. But people intentionally change their pronunciation of some words for many reasons, most of them unrelated to systemic sound change and all of them unpredictable. The number of words to which deliberate changes are made can be small compared to the whole vocabulary, to which unconscious changes apply, but they can muddy the water to the point of demanding extensive knowledge of the history and sociology of the culture that spoke the language to sort them out. Deliberate systemic sound change as a means of affirming the solidarity of an in-group^a also occurs.

^a Historical Grammar of Japanese, Oxford University Press 1928, p. 44

Can we get any reliable linguistic data from these texts? Does rejecting Karlgren's claims of uniform rime in the Odes, backward regular development, and rigidly homorganic phonetic series (see below, p. xxxviii) leave nothing on which to base the reconstruction of old Chinese? If so, it would be better to acknowledge that than to pretend we can read text without language. But rejecting these notions does not close every avenue to the language of these texts. We are not the first to try to reconstruct something from scattered remains that were distorted by fossilization. We can learn from what others have done.

I use the modified Holmesianism that many paleo-something-ologists employ to reconstruct old buildings or old animals or old climate or whatever. Sherlock Holmes's formula, "Once you eliminate the impossible, whatever remains—however improbable—must be the truth," is unworkable. My version is "Eliminating what is very improbable, give added credence to what is less improbable." (By improbable I mean implying what does not happen and not what does happen.) This approach starts from a conjectural explanation of the phenomena under investigation, makes predictions implied by that explanation, modifies it to make its predictions differ less from new observations, and so on back and forth. The rest of this essay concerns tools and methods of quasi-Holmesian philology and some difficulties of applying them to CC.

We have these kinds of good or fairly good evidence:

- a. rimes. There are many thousands of them; we need not depend solely on the Odes.
- b. puns. They are trickier to use than rimes, but they can give evidence about initials. Bodman's study of puns in late Han (see below, p. xx n) is an example.
- c. phonetic elements of graphs. They can be hard to identify, as I show below (p. xxxv).
- d. alternate graphs. They are informative if they use different phonetic elements.
- e. Chinese writers' reports of Chinese languages not their own. Noteworthy are Yang Hsiung 揚雄 (below, p. xvi) and much later Yen Chih-t'ui 顏之推, but there are others.
- f. comparands within Chinese. This vast body of data has been nearly ignored. Wang and Downer broached it, as I mentioned above (p. xv n. b); Karlgren toyed with it.^b Serruys's work on Han dialects used a "comparative method"^c that compared real words to made-up ones, giving, of course, made-up results. (See below, p. xxxix.)

We have these kinds of marginal or poor evidence:

- a. analyzing the structure of graphs. This game is called etymology by sinologists.
- b. loan-words from non-Chinese languages. They are few—Chinese is not hospitable to foreign words—and their paths of transmission to China are mostly impossible to trace. It is a vitiating oversimplification to assume that a foreign word arrived in China in the same phonetic shape it had in a standard language in its country of origin. (See below, p. xxii.)

c. Chinese writers' guesses about their own language. These are as accurate as any English-speaking amateur's guesses about English, which is to say mostly ill-informed.

Two restrictions distinguish my treatment of this evidence from that of sinology. There are no privileged data. Even measurements taken in laboratories with calibrated instruments can be in error, a fact so widely recognized that scientists have developed statistical procedures to allow for the likelihood of error. No end would be served by an attempt to list all kinds of error to be found in the old Chinese texts we have inherited. Instead we need a continuous conscious effort to keep in mind that although we must utilize this evidence there is no datum in it to which we can point and say with confidence, "We can be sure this is valid." There are no privileged opinions. The assumption that Chinese ethnicity amounts to an intellectual high ground or superior coign of vantage from which to view old Chinese texts is a widespread fallacy among sinologists. At its mildest this is mere laziness but more extreme forms can verge on racism. Unfounded reliance on the accuracy of all traditional scholia is just one of the unfortunate results of this unjustifiable attitude.

Rime books, 反切 spelling and pronunciation

The most complete rime book of medieval Chinese we have is 廣韻, published in A.D. 1008, four centuries later than the earliest rime-book we have, Ch'ieh Yün 切韻, which does not survive in its entirety. The fragments of 切韻 preserved at Tunhuang are available together with other old rime-book fragments collated with 廣韻 in Shih Yün Hui Pien 十韻彙編.^a They give readings of graphs in 反語 "split words". (This 反 was a word for "split" related to words like 版 and 叛, later re-analyzed as "reverse".) The method spells one syllable by splitting two syllables of which the first gives the initial including aspiration and the second the rest of the syllable including tone, so that /d'iwɔ: is spelled 直呂反 "/d'ɪək and /liwɔ: split." Discard the final of 直 /d'ɪək and the initial of 呂 /liwɔ: to get /d'ɪək liwɔ: by merging what is left. In 廣韻 the formula is altered to 直呂切 "/d'ɪək and /liwɔ: cut." Substitution of 切 for 反 in this formula is an example of a thing we see again and again, the replacement of an obsolete word by a current one in a traditional phrase. The later term 反切 for the spelling-graphs combines the two verbs. (The 切 of the book title 切韻 is not "cut" but rather the stative verb "be closely related.")

Some indication can be seen of variation in the use of 反切 between 廣韻 and earlier rime books. Part of that difference may be due to early stages of fronting and palatalizing of velar initials before certain vowels. A yod-glide is, in theory, only to be represented in 反切 spelling by the choice of a syllable with yod to represent the final; the first syllable contributes, in theory, only its initial to the syllable being spelled. But how, then, does one spell a type of syllable that is only just beginning to work its way into the language, for which equivalents do not exist in the standard inventory of 反切 graphs? I think we see one answer to that in entry 1.37.38 𪛗, whose 反切 乞加 ought, in theory, to give the same syllable as the 苦加 of 1.37.32 𪛗, but which I think might instead indicate an emergent /k'ia or even something partway between /k'ia and /i'ia. The same thing is seen in 4.28.15 𪛗 whose 反切 居盍 may contrast with the 古盍 of 4.28.11 𪛗.

Palatal fricatives and affricates occur in 反切 for use with finals lacking yod. Spellings like 賞敢 /šâm: and 昌來 /tš'âi might be unusual ways of writing /šâm: and /tš'âi, or they might indicate that some speakers in the time of 廣韻 felt a distinction between a retroflex tongue posture and a more bunched alveopalatal gesture.

Transliterations like /lǎng and /d'ǎng might be rendered /lǎng and /d'ǎng. This cannot be specified with more precision than our exiguous knowledge of dialects allows, but if some speakers in the time of 廣韻 said /lɛk with tongue-gestures more similar to those of /ʃɛk than those of /liək, the development from Archaic t- preceding a, ǎ and other vowels to Ancient /l- would be consistent with that of s- to /ʃ- in the same environment.

Important as these questions are, they are not major difficulties. The labial glide is. The lips can be rounded anywhere in a syllable, including while shut as during a labial stop, but 反切 as we understand them allow labialization at only one place in the syllable, and indicate its presence or absence inconsistently; thus 遠支 /jiw^(an ts)ie gives /jiwie while 居万 /ki^(o miw)om- gives /kiom-. Karlgren's claim of two degrees of lip-rounding, /-u- and /-w-, has been questioned, but evidence does point that way. I think it worth taking seriously.

We cannot extract more precision from a handbook than went into the making of it. Transliterated 反切 can give the impression of being phonetic transcriptions; they are not. To view rime-book compilers as forerunners of modern linguistic scientists applying uniform methods to homogeneous data is a serious error, as is also to think of 反切 as either phonemic rather than phonetic or vice versa. What they are, for the most part, is conventional. We do not know who first proposed any given pair of graphs as 反切 for a syllable, nor by what standards the sameness of the sounds was judged. Such standards not being explicit, we may doubt that such judgments were made consistently by speakers of varied dialects over the centuries from 切韻 to 廣韻 and however long prior to 切韻, even before we take into account the absence of basic concepts like minimal contrast. In reconstructing pronunciation from 反切 we need other sources of data to supplement 反切.

The theory called 等韻學 of Szü-ma Kuang 司馬光 and others is not a tool of research but an object of research, like alchemy or herbal lore. Its terms are too vague to be accurately applied by anyone but a speaker of the theoreticians' own dialect. Its concepts are so abstract from human speech that some are illustrated with a diagram of a hand, not a mouth. Distinctions we consider important, eg relative speed of a tongue gesture, or tongue shape versus contact point in stop closures, are unknown to it. And it lacks historical perspective.

Classical Chinese word-books usable with caution

Four Han-era word-books, Shuo Wen Chieh Tzū 說文解字 Dissecting Graphs & Explaining Elements (briefly 說文), Fang Yen 方言 Regional Speech, Erh Ya 爾雅 Copious Euphuism, and Shih Ming 釋名 Explaining Terms, are themselves CC texts. I include few citations from 說文. Its glosses are unhelpful in reading CC texts; its dissection of graphs is arbitrary. (Dissection in the mode of 說文, which amounts to little more than playing charades on paper, is what sinologists call "etymology.") The research it deserves would require a knowledge of CC at least as good as that of its author, Hsü Shên 許慎. The other books are better, but all give difficulty in their approaches to the questions they address.

The author of the 方言, Yang Hsiung 揚雄, is notable for the variant graphs he uses for ordinary ones, and his poetry employs a huge vocabulary. His 法言 and 太玄, "improved versions" of two classics, remind one of Ralph Vaughan Williams's improvements of old English tunes, meant to show how much better these things can be done than they have been done. In the 方言 I see not the careful methodical notes of a field linguist but the jottings of a poet seeking exotic words for his gorgeous verses. It is ill suited to be the sole foundation of a systematic differentiation of the dialects of its author's time, but collation of its evidence with comparands from other texts might yield rich results.

Few readers can have been able to gain elucidation of words met in the reading of texts from the laconic glosses in the 爾雅. I think it is a thesaurus to broaden the active vocabulary of students learning to write. The words it glosses are largely drawn from canonical texts because the accretion of glosses they had already accumulated was a fine crib for such a book and because in elegant writing one was supposed to quote the canon: Confucius advised studying the Odes to improve one's vocabulary. We need caution in using such a book to translate CC texts, but its glosses are worth quoting to the modern student.

The 釋名 is patently meant for students learning to read and write. It glosses thousands of everyday words. Most of its glosses are puns, so it is easy to mischaracterize the 釋名. Learned Chinese scholiasts, grave and solemn with the weight of their erudition, glossed the 釋名 in the conviction that a book that must have taken so much work to write could hardly be meant to expound anything less momentous than exegesis of the lapidary aphorisms of Yao and Shun or the subtle involutions of the Yin, the Yang and the Five Elements; they were painting legs on a snake. As well take Dr. Seuss to be a guide to the writings of Thomas Aquinas. The author, of whom we know little more than his name, Liu Hsi 劉熙, may simply have been an irrepressible punster. I take it he meant students to memorize the book and thought the puns would help them do that.

The formula which most 釋名 glosses share is “A is B because something about B,” where A sounds like B. An example of this form in English: “Dog is dig; it buries bones to dig them up.” But sometimes that formula is modified (I suspect because the author lacked a pun for his definiens, A, but had a good one for a synonym B), and we get “A is B because something about B,” where B sounds like one of the other words in the “something” part. English example: “Sweet is candy; nothing so dandy as candy.” No problem if the point is to give the kids a key for memorizing. But if you insist that B is a sound-gloss of A you distort the book, because then you must either find a reading of B, no matter how improbable or how tenuous its supporting evidence, that will sound like A, or you must find another graph to substitute for B, justifying your emendation by appeal to your theory and your theory by the evidence of your emended text.

Now if 劉熙, surely one of the most resourceful punsters who ever lived, could not find a common word to pun on A, are we likely to do so? The result is as if my example were emended to “Sweet is thwait; nothing so dandy as thwait,” justified by some rigmarole about how the well-known dandy Beau Brummel preferred Hepplewhite furniture and -white is a doublet of thwait. Observe:

252. Example 252a is discussed in Karlgren's gloss 1358. The a word [ie 埴] means “sticky, clayey.” The b word [ie 臍], properly “slice of dried meat” is substituted [for 臍] by Pi because of a passage in Chuang-tzū, and the Wu version follows Pi also. Yet here, although the reading is ŋiək/tsiək, it must stand for 糈 l.f. “glue, sticky matter.” The commentators also point out that Liu Hsi followed the chin wen “modern text” of the Shang Shu here.³

Just so. And Dr. Suess followed the English-language text of Aquinas. Bodman did not give this the big razoo George Kennedy might have done, but his scepticism is clear.

A third formula, “A is B [because] something about AB,” splits binomes. This does not define A as B; it associates A with B to aid recognition of the word. English example: “Hinder is land; the mind is hindered in the hinterland.” Real examples: 丁壯也 tieng [cyclical] is tɕiəŋ “strong” [tiengtɕiəŋ “healthy”]. 偃蹇也 ŋiən “lie down” is kiən “crippled” [ŋiənkiən “remiss, negligent”]. 筋力也 “Sinew” is “strength” [筋力 “vigorously”].

Explicit definitions accompany some puns in 釋名. Examples:

土黃而細密曰埴埴膩也黏肥如脂之膩也 If dirt is yellow-brown and finely powdered it is called clay. Clay is niar “greasy,” niamniar “sticky” like the niar “greasiness” of fat.

二達口歧旁物兩爲曰歧在邊口旁此道並通出似之也 “Two lanes are called ‘split-side.’ What acts pairwise is called ‘split,’ and at the edge is called ‘side.’ On this road they both get through so it’s like that.”

And the justifications of the puns can be gems of concise informativeness. Examples:

雪緩也水下遇寒氣而凝緩然也 “siwat ‘snow’ is snīwār ‘comforting’; water descends, encounters cold vapor and freezes, becomes gentle and quiet.”

氛粉也潤氣著草木因寒凝色白若粉之形也 “b’iwān ‘hoarfrost’ is piwān ‘flour’; the nourishing vapor adheres to plants and trees and freezes due to cold; it becomes white like the appearance of flour.”

Etymology is not meaning

With the minor exceptions of newly-coined technical terms and newly-introduced loan words, no word ever has a limited sense that can be called “fundamental” or “original.” Words are used in extended senses every day. An extension that is widely adopted becomes another acceptance of the word. There is never a point in the history of any language at which it has only a core vocabulary without variants or doublets or extended senses. Consider these examples from English:

check (= “draft on a demand deposit”)	Check that! (= “Let me correct my error.”)
Check! (= “That’s correct.”)	checker (= “game piece”)
Check! (= “Guard your king.”)	checker (= “tallyman”)
Check! (= “Bring the bill, please.”)	Checkers (name of a dog)

The syllable check in all of the above examples derives from the same word, Persian šāh “king”. Would someone learning English be helped to master these idioms by knowing that? Would a fluent speaker asked to Check out this book be enabled by this etymology to decide whether the request is to examine the book or to withdraw it from a library?

Etymology is an essential part of the historical study of language. For learning to read a language to draw information from texts written in it, etymology is a distraction. It can be of use in following the discourse of certain learned writers who pay careful attention to derivations of words they use. Most writers do not; nor should most readers. It is better practice to make out a word’s meaning from examples of it in the works of your author and contemporaries. Typically, etymology only comes into play when a reader may be tempted to take a word in a sense that was not yet widely adopted at the date of the text.

Reanalysis changes meaning abruptly

Reanalysis is not folk-etymology nor malapropism nor punning, though it resembles all those. An example of reanalysis is clean-cut, used to refer to a face of stereotypically Nordic appearance, as if cut cleanly along planes from a block. It was reanalyzed as if clean meant “bathed” and cut meant “shaven and shorn.” Another example is truck farm, in which truck “trade, business” is often taken to be an unrelated word meaning “cargo vehicle.” Reanalysis of words like miscegenation, problematic and sacrilegious is common.

Sound change facilitates reanalysis; loss of the unvoiced velar fricative in English allowed the reanalysis of playwright that assimilates the second syllable to write. Reanalysis finds what is not there: the rage in outrage is re-analyzed as “anger” instead of the same -age as in arbitrage. Reanalysis can change the meaning of an idiom. For example, the word round in reference to gunfire means a single shot. I have seen news articles in which a burst of shots is called a round. (I suppose reporters reanalyze round here in the context of a round of drinks.) The reanalysis of prove from “validate” (i.e. probo) to “invalidate” (as in proving ground) in the catch phrase the exception proves the rule is another example. The results of reanalysis can be amusing to one who knows the previous use of the idiom, as illustrated by a journalistic lapsus reported in The New Yorker: said of a greengrocer, “...he ‘knew’ fruits and vegetables in the biblical sense.” Chinese writing is especially conducive to, and may almost be said to encourage, reanalysis by the incautious. Examples abound, eg the reanalysis of dim in Cantonese dimsum from “kindle” to “a little bit.”

Foreign loans and dialect loans complicate development

Subgroups 18 through 27 in the rime 戈 in 廣韻 are not in GSR, as not found in early texts. These subgroups may illustrate one aspect of the actual—rather than theoretical—development of sound-change in Chinese.

The 切韻 fragment with this rime has a lone example of one syllable of the ten in 廣韻. It transliterates kya in the name Śākyamuni and other Indic words. The 切韻 entry is 伽無反語虔之平聲一 “No 反切. Level tone of 虔 [kiwo]^a. One.”

Before GSR, Karlgren reconstructed^b 伽 and 茄 from 反切 in 廣韻, making them gia. George Kennedy disputed^c that reconstruction based on the word in his native Wu dialect for “eggplant” which lacks yod and is in minimal contrast with a word for “brave” which has yod. There are indeed objections to Karlgren’s treatment of Archaic g’i-, (see below, pp. 1-1i) but the solution Kennedy proposed, to derive Tangsic gha- from Archaic g’a, is questionable, as, for that matter, is Karlgren’s gia. Both ignored information they should have considered.

Karlgren’s final /-a instead of /-â would put these words into the next rime, 麻, in which no final with yod takes a velar or knacklaut initial. The corresponding rimes in second and third tones, 馬 and 禡, also have no velar nor knacklaut initial with yod. Karlgren reconstructed a syllable that is not only out of its rime-group but phonotactically unlikely to boot. But Kennedy’s archaic g’a is also out of group. The compilers of these rime-books were no more immune to error than any other humans, but if we cannot assume that they had at least a fairly clear idea of what they were doing and did it fairly consistently then we cannot use these sources. If we accept them as sources of data then we ought to take what they say at face value unless strong considerations argue against doing that. In discussing these words, Kennedy ignores the fact that if the 切韻 compilers had wanted to spell /-a or /-ia they had means to do so which they did not use. They placed this syllable as a rime of /-â, compared it to a word ending in /-o, and said they could not find any way to spell it.

“Eggplant” is a bad choice on which to base a critique of Archaic Chinese, since it is likely that neither the plant nor the word was known in China in the Archaic period. There are several species of eggplant, some of which grow wild in northeastern India, where the cultivated species, Solanum melongena, is thought to have been domesticated. From there eggplant was introduced to China by some unknown route. I have seen no evidence that it was known in China before the T’ang dynasty at the earliest. Its common English name comes from the fruit of S. melongena esculentum, which is white. Another name, aubergine, had an exemplary career as a loan-word. Apparently Hindi bhaṅṭā, from Sanskrit bhaṅṭākī, became Persian badingan or badilgan, which became badinjan in Arabic. Al-badinjan, with enclitic article (as with alcohol, algorithm and the like) went into Spanish as alberengena. French reanalyzed alberengena into à le berengene and hyper-urbanized it into aubergine. Spanish alberengena became Italian melanzana, folk-etymologized as mela insana. From Arabic badinjan, through Portuguese bringella, it was brought back to India to become the Anglo-Indian brinjaul. (The entry BRINJAUL in Hobson-Jobson, from which much of this comes, is worth reading in its entirety.) As brinjal the word went from Hindi into Malay. From India the British took the variant brinjalle to the West Indies where it became brown-jolly. There is also the Hindi baingan, either re-borrowed from Persian or, more plausibly, directly from Sanskrit vanga, vangana, “of Bengal.”

Consider this imaginary scenario: a Chinese monk from Ch'êngtu who has studied Sanskrit but not Pali is tutored in a certain text by another monk, a Tibetan who knows little Sanskrit but has a good, if bookish, command of Pali acquired from his tutor, a Uighur. Later the Chinese monk goes to Ch'angan, where he expounds this text to other monks who may have a bit of trouble with his accent. Anyone who can trace a line of phonological development of a loan-word through that thicket would have no trouble deducing the geometry of Euclid from a plate of spaghetti. One thing does seem likely, however, and that is that divergent pronunciations in Mandarin, Wu, Min and Yüeh of loan-words from Indic languages would have undergone some of their divergence before their initial contact with the various Chinese dialects, and furthermore that some of that divergence would not have been anything a linguist would call “regular development”.

Now consider someone who feels a religious obligation to pronounce holy names as accurately as can be done. The first thing to note—and for the purpose of reconstructing obsolete Chinese, this must be grasped firmly as a basic principle of the endeavor—is that it does not matter how the word was pronounced, by anyone at any time, in a land where the source-language is or was spoken. The only available model for the learner is the individual human being, the teacher, who enunciates the word in the learner's presence. That, and no other, is the sound the learner will imitate.

Early tries will be sounds that lie entirely within the phonemic possibilities of the learner's language. Only with disciplined practice can a better imitation be achieved. Then how does one who has acquired the ability to produce that imitation convey in writing a sense of how it is done? One way would be with a physical description of the movements of the speech-organs. Another might be to prescribe a combination of phones from the learner's language that, while phonotactically unacceptable, still gives a good approximation if one can force oneself to enunciate it. In my experience of teaching languages, that way doesn't work very well. But I think that is the method the 切韻 compilers selected, in their poverty of choice, for the syllable they wrote 伽 and tacked on to the end of the 歌 rime with the comment that it was pronounced like a word in the 御 rime but in first tone. They wanted to indicate a syllable that could not have been generated by the phonology of their native language but which some of them had learned to pronounce artificially in a foreign word. My best guess at its sound is /k̄iuâ. If that guess is accurate then there must have been some rounded quality to the second vowel in Śākyamuni as pronounced by educated Chinese in Ch'angan in AD 601 regardless of what might have been heard in Chittagong or Chandigarh—and regardless of how it may seem to us who see the letter a in the romanization of the written Sanskrit.

Separation of the rime 戈 is first seen in 廣韻. Earlier books conflated it with the preceding rime 歌. The table of contents of 廣韻 says of 歌 rimes 戈同用 “they are used the same as 戈”, which seems to indicate that they felt the labial medial rather than the vowel quality was distinctive. Finals that have labial medial do not interchange as 反切 with finals that lack it, as far back as we can trace the use of 反切. (I am happy to follow Kennedy's example in the article cited above, of deferring the question of the labialization of vowels after labial initials as a distinct problem. There is no end of delicious detail in this labyrinth, but to savor it all would extend this essay to book length.) The same segregation can be observed of finals with yod versus those without, but the rime-book compilers seem to assign more distinction-making power to the labial medial. All new rime groups that 廣韻 inserts by splitting unitary rimes segregate those with labial medial.

In 廣韻 there are nineteen words in the ten subgroups we are considering. Their entries are given in full here. (The number at the end of the first entry of each subgroup is not the number of homophonous words but the number of graphs with that reading.)

- (I) 鞞鞞鞋釋名曰鞞本胡服趙武靈王所服許脰切四 Boots. Shih Ming says they were originally C. Asian clothing, that worn by the Wu-ling King of Chao. The 反切 are 許脰 (/ɕiŋwâ). Four.
- (1) 鞞上同 Same as above.
- (2) 批搗 To wave.
- (3) 靴道藏疏云吐氣聲也 Taoist Patrology commentary says sound of expelling air.
- (4) 脰脰髀手足曲病於靴切二 Disease of hands & feet being bent. The 反切 are 於靴 (/iŋwâ). Two.
- (5) 餓餓恒癡兒出釋典 /iŋwâk'iŋuâ a way of being stupid. From Buddhist scripture.
- (6) 髀手足疾兒去靴切二 Describes disease of hands & feet. The 反切 are 去靴 (/k'iŋwâ). Two
- (6) 髀上同 Same as above.
- (7) 伽伽藍求迦切三 Monastery. The 反切 are 求迦 (/g'iŋuâ). Three.
- (8) 茄茄子可菜食又音加 Eggplant. Acceptable in vegetarian diet. Also read 加 (/ka).
- (9) 枷刑具又音加 Tool of punishment. Also read 加 (/ka).
- (10) 佉丘伽切四 The 反切 are 丘伽 (/k'iŋuâ). Four.
- (II) 呿張口兒 Way of opening mouth.
- (12) 欸欠去 Missing, gone away.
- (5) 恒餓恒 [Used in this word.]
- (13) 迦釋迦出釋典居伽切又音加一 Śākya. From Buddhist scripture. The 反切 are 居伽 (/k'iŋuâ). Also read 加 (/ka). One.
- (14) 脰脰也醋伽切二 Tender. The 反切 are 醋伽 (/ts'iŋuâ). Two.
- (15) 𨾏𨾏疾 Lively.
- (16) 𨾏安也子髀切二 Comfortable. The 反切 are 子髀 (/tsiŋwâ). Two.
- (17) 𨾏骨𨾏出異字苑 Bone marrow. From Garden of Odd Graphs.
- (18) 癩脚手病巨靴切一 Disease of feet & hands. The 反切 are 巨靴 (/g'iŋwâ). One.
- (19) 臄驢腸胃也縷髀切 Mule's guts. The 反切 are 縷髀 (/liŋwâ).

I see not aliens but native words, some with pedigrees of millennia in China, mixed with a few aliens. They look even more Chinese after we leave out three kinds of word:

- a. Post-Archaic loan-words. Word 1 is likely to be an old loan-word, perhaps as old as the former Han, but out of period for Archaic Chinese. Indic antecedents for 7, 8 and 13 are known or conjectured.
- b. Proper names and onomatopes, as lacking semantic content. Such are words 3 and 10.
- c. Word 5, on the grounds that its meaning is vague and its provenance compromising.

That leaves twelve words that are as Chinese as chopsticks.

Word 2 is a member of a huge word-family, of immemorial origin, meaning "flutter, flap, fly." Two of its cousins are the posthumous epithets of the Chinese heroes Wên Wang and Wu Wang.

Words 4, 6 and 18 belong to a family mentioned here (see below, p. xxxvi).

Word 9 is related to old words for “yoke” and “to harness.”

Word 11 has many relatives, some with well-attested labial final, such as 廬, 𠂔, 𠂔, and 𠂔. The family includes a very old word, 𠂔 k'u (my k'eb) “mouth.”

Word 12 is hardly disguised at all. A close relative is found in oracle bone inscriptions.

Word 14 belongs to an old family of words related to crumbling and crushing.

Word 15 looks similar to words like 𠂔, 𠂔, and 𠂔. I relate them to words like 捷 dz'iap “quick.”

Word 16 belongs to another big Chinese family, many of which are written with phonetics like 妥 and 委.

Word 17 is mentioned below (p. xxxvii). Note that the the 廣韻 editors felt no need to cite another word for “marrow” as definiens; the mere repetition of the definiendum in the context of bone must have been thought to suffice. Contrast “eggplant” which had to be identified as a vegetable in its definition.

Word 19 comes from yet another big old family; a typical member is 累 “twist, twine.”

In the interval from 切韻 to 廣韻, that is to say in a few years more than the length of the Tang dynasty, the sound /-iuâ has been domesticated from the exotic lilt of a recent immigrant to a number of echt-Chinese, even ur-Chinese, words. What happened? There are phenomena attested in other languages that cannot be ruled out but that strike me as implausible in this case. One might be conscious exoticism, like corn-fed midwesterners donning sari or dhoti to eat curried brinjal. Raiders of the lost affix might espy here a new trophy; something like a lateral nasal click would fit that empty niche in their étagère. I suggest some Chinese pronounced the word for “go away” as /k'iuâ before they had heard of Śākyamuni. This pronunciation would be a reflex of the standard Ancient Chinese word k'iab (my k'iāb) in a low-status dialect avoided by anyone likely to write a learned book.

One function of pronunciation is to give an indication, often an inflated one, of the speaker's social status. Dialect borrowings are unlikely unless the status difference between them can be neutralized or overridden. I suggest that was the case in Ch'angan in the Tang dynasty. Exotic words the like of which could not be heard in standard Chinese were bandied about by high-status people, including the highest. Sounds like /k'iuâ must have dropped from many a lofty lip, not only with no stigma but even with a certain cachet. In such surroundings a high-class lady's /k'iwo- “go away” might be replaced by a maid's /k'iuâ without the status difference being obvious. The standard word would have remained /k'iwo-, but /k'iuâ would have climbed from unacceptable vulgarism to acceptable variant within standard speech.

Graphic variation adds to uncertainty

Old Chinese texts have passed through many scribal brushes. The freedom granted the Chinese brush exceeds any claimed for the western pen. Difficult calligraphy is admired of which the equivalent in western penmanship is execrated. (Mark Twain amuses us by mocking the illegibility of Horace Greeley's handwriting; a Chinese writer doing that would tar himself as a boor.^a) Labels like 俗 and 譎, englished by “vulgar,” “corrupt” and other sniffy pejoratives, tempt us to pursue a fata morgana, the uncorrupted original form of a graph. In the chaotic history of Chinese writing, the phrase “original form” is meaningless. Of these graphs 𠂔𠂔𠂔𠂔𠂔𠂔𠂔 for χiek “spear,” some look very much like careless copies of others; note 𠂔~𠂔, 𠂔~𠂔 and 𠂔~𠂔~𠂔 in particular. Plausible phonetics are 勺役兮号号, while 𠂔𠂔𠂔𠂔 could be dual-significs. Knowing which one is attested earliest, or that some also write other words, or write the same word in other readings, adds nothing to our knowledge of which is altered from which, nor to our knowledge of what a χiek is.

^a The Fei Tsao Shu Lum 非草書論 Against Grass Writing of Chao Yi 趙壹 (translated below, pp. 459-60) condemns his late-Han contemporaries' 草書 for departure from classical norms; he also notes that it is hard to learn to write. His attitude is not common among the educated.

We can guess at some variants' antecedents. Consider 坐, a variant of 坐 dz'wâ "squat" not found in 康熙字典 or GSR, though it is in a book recommended by GSR,^a 十韻彙編.^b The form of 坐 in 說文 became 聖. Perhaps 坐, like the variants 聖 and 聖 (not phonetic in 聖), evolved directly from the ancestor of 聖. Noting that in cursive forms like 坐 the 人 looks like 厶, I suggest rather that the perceived 厶 was re-regularized as 口, of which it is a common variant. We may find a graph's earlier forms to be unlikely ancestors. The graphs 筭, 筭 and 筭, says 康熙字典, are all variants of 筭 tsäk "a quiver." The only graph GSR gives for this word is 筭, but older forms of phonetic 806, such as 806d and 806e, show that a more direct development of the graph now written 乍 would have been 𠄎, which seems to give 筭 a stronger claim than 筭 to be the "proper way" to write this graph.

Respect for standards is valuable to anyone who puts writing to practical use. A writer who misuses whom or uses beg the question to mean prompt one to ask or writes a barbarism like as best as possible inspires in a careful reader not only disdain but distrust. But standards are not eternal and are never beyond dispute. Thus of what seem to me to be variant forms of a graph, I label a few ranges on a continuum from error at one end to free variation at the other. Error is what a writer would correct if given the chance. It may be obvious, as typing hte for the, or less so, as using it's for its. Correctness depends partly on currency, so a form which was correct, like iland, may come to be considered an error for a usurper like island, now the correct form. Free variation is shown in such choices as recognize versus recognise. Pedantic pressure to codify such differences post factum is strong, so what is free variation in one era may become substandard in another. I say a graph is "used for" another if I put it toward the error end of the spectrum, and "variant of" if I put it toward the other end. I call variant graphs that have been reduced from longer forms "scribal simplifications," and others "casual variants." (So-called "loan graphs" such as 說 and 悅 for diwat "happy," I enter without comment.)

Textual corruption falsifies evidence

Few English speakers seeing Let's have a mice cop of ten would look for rodent police. The invitation to a nice cup of tea is too clear for that. Knowing varied forms of writing might help one see how such errors could occur, but would not contribute to noticing that the line makes no sense. A non-English speaker using sinological methods to read that line would be deep in sludge. One who had learned English as a language would have much less trouble. But if our only source of speech on which to model our growing language competence is the very texts which confront us with such errors, we need an unusual, artificially cultivated mental state I call "tentative confidence."

The Huainantzü 淮南子, which has enough textual corruption to suggest that copying texts for sale might have been done by child labor, has an example. The context is that a guard who deliberately allowed a surrounded man to escape is wounded by the fugitive passing through the cordon. The guard says 我非故與子反也. Nothing in sinological principle or practice would prevent us from translating that as, "We rebelled with the viscount for a false reason." One who reads only characters and has learned only character-meanings, regardless of how many thousands of them, is nearly defenseless against such a preposterous misreading. One who reads utterances, and notes their syntax while reading them, is better armed. Such a reader would recognize that the subject-非-nucleus-也 pattern of the embedded nuclear sentence has far the strongest claim to this utterance, and if that claim is granted, 故 must be a nuclear adjunct. Some readers only know 故 as nuclear adjunct meaning “therefore,” but others have seen 故 where 固 is common, as “surely, firmly.”

So we have “It is not true that I firmly with you 反,” and must learn what 反 means here. From context we guess at an idiomatic extension of “reverse, turn around” to mean “oppose, fight against.” Thus we lead ourselves into the temptation to make a grave strategic blunder. This is how Bernhard Karlgren, for all his years of experience, could get so many things so wrong: having solved a problem he took that solution not as a good guess but as a proved theorem, on which further deduction could be soundly based. It took dynamite (or George Kennedy) to get him to alter such fixed opinions. That works in mathematics and only in mathematics. In science you must go back and re-examine everything, again and again, in the light of new evidence. There is no end to the process. Never assume that having solved a problem you can lay it aside and go on to new ones. Instead, each problem’s solution is a new item to be tested against other solutions.

If we do that in this case, we find that further examples of 與X反 meaning “oppose X” are not forthcoming. So for all its excellent fit with context, our solution turns out not to fit the use of the word 反. What to do then? Examine words we see as Y in the pattern 與XY. We find a plausible emendation to the text: 我非故與子爭也 “I wasn’t seriously resisting you.”

Han forms of these two graphs such as 反→反 and 爭→爭 are more similar than modern forms, which would explain how the error might have come about, but note two things: first, it was not paleography that led to solving the textual difficulty, but vice versa. Second, if we could not find similar old forms of the graphs, still the probability is high that 爭 and not 反 was written originally, because it is 爭 and not 反 that is used in this manner. No matter how close the visual resemblance may be, linguistic analysis, not comparison of handwriting, led us to this decision. This solution, though it is more persuasive than the one it replaced, must be given the same “tentative” label as the earlier one.

This difficulty is not a rare curiosity, nor is it limited to examples like the one just cited that are not immediately obvious. It is common enough and crude enough to have already been a joke around 250 B.C. when the author of Lü Shih Ch’un-ch’iu 呂氏春秋 told of a scribe reading the line 晉師三豕涉河 “The Chin force and three pigs crossed the Yellow River,” which in the original document turned out to be 晉師己亥涉河 “The Chin force crossed the Yellow River on the day chi-hai.” There are two obvious examples in the very same story from which the [反→]爭 example comes. When the man first tried to flee they 圍三帀 “forfended three circles.” What I suggest they did is 圍之市 “surrounded him in the marketplace.” When all seemed hopeless, he 將舉劍而伯頤 “was about to raise his sword and make his chin the Overlord,” which I suggest is an error for 將舉劍而自[頸→]剄 “was about to raise his sword and cut his throat.”

Rime and parallelism can correct errors

Obligatory in poetry, rime also plays an important role in Chinese prose. That is helpful to those who would read old texts as their authors’ contemporaries would have, the more so when it intersects the frequent use of parallel sentence structure. Anything highlighted for any reason in a prose passage, as a telling aphorism or a climactic revelation or an emotional response or whatever, may be cast in parallel lines of rimed verse. A well-known story in the Tso Chuan 左傳, appended to the 春秋 entry 鄭伯克段于鄆, has a fine example: 大隧之中 lîông 其樂也融融 dîông-dîông . . . 大隧之外 ngwâd 其樂也洩洩 ziad-ziad

A passage in Chan Kuo Ts’ê 戰國策 puzzles commentators. A snipe says to a mussel that has trapped its beak 今日不雨明日不雨即有死蚌. The problem is what has rain to do with it? It can be solved by noting that the strict parallel structure requires a rime. The snipe says 今日不亢明日不亢 即有死蚌 “If you don’t open today and don’t open tomorrow there will be a dead mussel.”

Unnoticed errors can be winkled out with these tools. Seeing When what to my wondering eyes should appear/ But a miniature sleigh and eight tiny jackasses if we are sensitive to the rime we need not know that the original read reindeer, we need not even be aware that the word reindeer exists, to perceive that something is amiss. The 淮南子 has many errors like 惑 for 聳, 高 for 嵩, 難 for 難, 舟 for 餘, 門 for 門, 捐 for 捐, 號 for 躑, and 容 for 容 which commentators pass in silence, ignoring their crashing break in the rime. (Note the tendency for the error-graph to be the more frequently-seen one of the pair.)

The reader has as much responsibility to be alert for such errors as the copyist had to avoid making them. Lacking rime or parallelism, their recognition must come from your sprachgefühl: seeing 淪門 you read [淪→] 審門 “go through a gate.” No number of memorized characters confers this language competence; only language learning does.

The Chinese exegetic tradition

Commentaries appended to some texts are keys that let beginners in. The temptation to take them as final authority superior to evidence and logic is strong, and many a scholar who claims to be reading a classical text is only doing pilpul with its commentaries.³ Those that adduce parallels from other texts the reader might not have encountered are valuable. Not so those in which the exegete appends to a passage like, “Beat drums bang-bang,” some solemn idiocy like, “Bang-bang is the sound of beating drums.” Many definitions in dictionaries are just these text-glosses, adding to their failings the chance of the lexicographer’s misunderstanding the commentary. With questionable economy of effort, each copies definitions of precursors, intact or truncated or garbled. Watch cascading commentaries in operation: on page 185 of Mathews’s Dictionary is the graph 瘳 with two glosses. The first is “To be healed. To reform,” and the second, “(a) Injury.” The second gloss is illustrated with a citation 於己何瘳 what harm can it do? Read in context, this passage does not support such an interpretation. The ruler of one of the petty states that bespeckled the Ch’ün-ch’ü landscape had a bad dream, in which an ogre announced that the supreme ancestor was going to allow one of the larger neighbor states to invade him, and to press the attack right up to the palace gate. A dream-reader identified the ogre as a kind of celestial attorney-general. The ruler proceeded to counter this threat by taking magical measures against the bogle, such as ordering that his dream be celebrated as if it had been a felicitous one, instead of trying to rally his populace and look to his defenses. One of his officers saw the folly of this, and remarked in private that the prediction he has heard, that this state will not much longer remain in existence, seems to be well justified by this kind of behavior, since 君不度而賀大國之襲於己也何瘳 “Our ruler does not make plans; instead he celebrates a larger state’s incursion into our own. What will that alleviate?”

The scholiast Wei Chao 韋昭 (ca. AD 200 – 273) adds three glosses:

度揆也 “Make plans” is “measure”. [Synonyms, claims the scholiast.]

大國晉也 “A larger state” is “Chin”. [A better gloss would have been 大國謂晉 “A larger state” refers to Chin, distinguishing connotation from denotation.]

瘳猶損也言君不揆度神意而令賀之何損於禍 “Alleviate” is like “decrease”. It says the ruler does not take the measure of the spirit’s meaning, but orders it to be celebrated. What does that decrease of the calamity?

³ For a sinologist’s view of this phenomenon see R.P. Peerenboom, Law and Morality in Ancient China, SUNY Press 1993, p. 2.

The first gloss misidentifies which word written with the graph 度 is meant. The second merely confirms what the reader would have inferred from the preceding text. The third begins a daisy-chain of blunders that ends in Mathews. Note two things about this third gloss. It seems that the scholiast did understand what the text says, but his gloss is amateurish and badly phrased, and a reader who has been following the text well enough to get this gloss does not need it. Mathews's claim that the same word means both "get better" and "make worse" originates in this clumsy, flab-minded nugatory graffito.

Commentaries must be taken into account, but they must be read with caution, not uncritically given plenary authority. One of the dangers they pose is their fortuitous resemblance to a thing all language students are familiar with, notes appended to a learners' edition of a text for advanced language courses. A moment's consideration should show the fallacy of assuming that these glosses were meant to teach CC to foreigners centuries in their authors' future, yet their form can mislead us to fall into that assumption unthinkingly.

In the example 大國晉也, 大 and 國 are such high-frequency words that anyone who reads this far into the text surely already knows them. The commentator's contemporaries did not need to be taught the words 大國. Other occurrences of 大國 show that it does not refer exclusively to 晉. It seems 韋昭 wanted to identify the correct one of the set of 大國 from which a reader might have chosen. A proper definition of 大國, something like 大國巨邦也, would need words of lower frequency than 大 and 國. This gloss 大國晉也 has the form of a general definition of a phrase abstracted from a sentence, but its content is an amplification of what that sentence connotes in this specific context.

With the same mismatch between form and content of a gloss, but with the relation of the words' frequencies reversed, so that a seeming definition couched in common words applies to words that are less common, it requires a conscious effort not to see a textbook compiler defining a word for students who had yet to learn it. Few sinologists make that effort, or even recognize the need for it. David Hawkes's "with...strained smirking laughter,"^a for 啞啞儒兒 "forced to act like a submissive dependent child" reflects the comment 強笑嚙也 by Wang Yi 王逸 (fl. ca. AD 125-140). I suggest 王逸 would have taken for granted that 儒 and 兒 did not need to be defined for his contemporaries, just as 韋昭 would have assumed 大 and 國 did not need it for his. The graph 儒 (variant 儒) writes a stative verb meaning "mild; gentle." The graph 兒 (variant 兒) writes an ergative verb meaning, of a child, "form a bond of dependency with parents," and of parents, "prompt a child to form such a bond." Extending this word to relations between adults in a political context is no stretch. It is used in Hsiüntzū 荀子 to refer to a ruler buying allegiance from his subjects with handouts, and in 淮南子 to refer to those who are well-disposed to the government as contrasted with those who are alienated from it. The gloss 強笑嚙也 does not define 啞啞儒兒; it describes the situation of an official serving a patriarchal autocrat. He must not only 儒兒 to his ruler in person but perforce to the harem and eunuchs as well. (A Sung gloss calling 啞啞 and 儒兒 mimetics for 強笑 apparently inhibited Hawkes from further exploiting his valuable insight that parallel structure requires acceptance of the textual variant 粟 for the standard text's 粟 in the preceding line.^b Parallelism also illumines the syntax of 啞啞儒兒, but Hawkes, like most sinologists, yields plenary authority to any Chinese scholiast.)

Nothing made by humans is ever just what it purports to be. We need to consider makers' motives in deciding how to use such things. Comparing makers' motives could let us predict in advance of experience that a phone book will be a more reliable list of referents of numbers than a gamblers' dream book. Helping other readers reach their own understanding of a text is not generally the motive of commentators; that is more likely to be the desire to show readers how superior the commentator's understanding is to their own untutored gropings. The result can be a cargo-cult imitation of scholarship. The mountebank W.A.C.H. Dobson was far from unique; he stood in a long line of phonies. An early specimen is the poseur who wrote the commentary to 淮南子 variously attributed to Kao Yu 高誘 and 許慎. It is a model for all time of how not to do the job if your aim is to further readers' grasp of the text. Compare it to Humpty Dumpty's commentary to Jabberwocky. Given 'Twas brillig and the slithy toves did gyre and gimble in the wabe, the 淮南子 commentator would probably single out 'twas as the word we need to have explained. Nor could we even count on him to make it out to be it was; he might construe it as referring to the ballad Twa Corbies. The words Humpty Dumpty glossed would likely be ignored.

Character dictionaries

Reading Classical Chinese we rely heavily on character dictionaries that vary in quality from poor to execrable. I mentioned their use of cascaded commentaries; here I show how their function is vitiated by their focus on characters rather than language. George Kennedy joking about looking up garden in a Chinese dictionary³ understates the case. As well as the split into gar and den, and the association with cigar and rock den, one might find the non-word dengar written with those graphs in inverted order, defined as synonymous with garden. In a compendious dictionary one might find it asserted that those graphs or their near relatives write words like cordon and guardian, or even gander and danger. It might be claimed that the graph for gar also writes den. There might be fantastic non-words like dargen or gendar. What would probably not be there is useful reference to the doublet yard or the names Garth and Bogart. There would be no mention of foreign equivalents like jardin or garten. Looking up characters is a miserable way to learn Chinese.

The efforts of traditional lexicographers to deal with variant graphs can be as inconsistent and unhelpful as anything to be found later in sinology, but they are worth a look for the light it may shed on their treatment of familiar "standard" graphs. Consider 旻, found in 康熙字典 with definition 入水又出 "go into water and come back out." Here is a puzzle for those who channel the spirits of long-dead Chinese scribes through a meditative trance on the elements of a graph. How did this graph come to be applied to this word? Sun over father meaning "go in and out of water"—hmm! Perhaps one ought to meditate on an older form of the graph? But 康熙字典 cites only P'ien Hai 篇海, a work of the 12th C. AD. Look it up in 說文—it's not there. Nor does one find a version of the graph with sun beside father instead of over it, nor anything under radical 88 父.

Before accepting 旻 as a unique graph for a unique word, we might have a last resort to advanced research techniques, such as considering the pronunciation of the word instead of the structure of the graph. The graph is not in 廣韻. Its reading in 康熙字典 is 他骨切, Ancient Chinese /tʰuət/. If the word is in 廣韻 it should be in the subgroup headed by 突 /tʰuət/. It is not, nor is any word that gets closer in meaning to 旻 than "protrude." Specific mention of water is lacking. However, if one's eye should wander over this same page of 廣韻 it might light on the graph 旻 in a subgroup by itself, not in the earlier rime books, defined as 入水又出 and given the reading 土骨切. The initial of 土 is the same as that of 他, and 𠂔 differs from 𠂔 only in having 冂 for 日, which may be casual variation. Is this confirmation of the existence of a word /tʷət meaning “go into water and come back out,” written with a graph consisting of sun over father? I’m not convinced.

Why is 𠂔 in its own subgroup of 廣韻 instead of in the 突 subgroup? In our earliest manuscript of 切韻, the 突 subgroup has three graphs; in 廣韻, three more have been added. Couldn’t 𠂔 have been added to 突 more easily than by creating a new subgroup for it alone? Note the graph 𠂔 on the same page, read 莫勃切 /mʷət, meaning “go into water and get something.” The graphs 𠂔 and 𠂔 differ only by two dots (Nowadays 𠂔 is written 𠂔~𠂔 while in older manuscripts such as 切韻 it is written 𠂔, a form now reserved for radical 79 and used to write /ʒju.) The graph 𠂔 is in 說文, where it is written 𠂔, analyzed as 𠂔 swirling water plus 𠂔 grasping hand. The barrier to conflating these graphs is not dots or lines but initials: t- and m- have essentially no contact within Chinese word families.

Perhaps doubt about whether 𠂔 writes a different word from 𠂔 kept the 廣韻 editors from putting it under 突 with other /tʷət words. Drawn by the graphic resemblance and semantic proximity, yet repelled by the outré notion of a pair of doublets with /t- and /m- in middle Chinese, they may have chosen not to choose, to quarantine 𠂔 with its distinctive 反切 and leave the choice to the reader. This reader has little doubt. If as I suppose the 土骨切 in 廣韻’s source was a copyist’s error for 亡骨切, it would not be the first time I have seen such an error. Whether 篇海 got 𠂔 from the 𠂔 of 廣韻 or the the two drew from a common source at one or more removes I cannot say, but the 他骨 of 篇海 accepts the bad choice that the 廣韻 editors rejected.^a This variation 𠂔~𠂔~𠂔~𠂔~𠂔~𠂔~𠂔 is like that of 𠂔~𠂔~殺~𠂔~𠂔~𠂔~𠂔~𠂔 χiek “spear” and 𠂔~𠂔~𠂔~𠂔~𠂔~𠂔 dz’wâ “squat” (above, p. xxvii). The dots might be drops of water falling from the hand, or they might be calligraphic flourishes like the dot that is sometimes added to 土 or 石 to make the fully equivalent variant 𠂔 or 𠂔. Or they might be flyspecks on the old manuscript.

The graphs 𠂔 𠂔 𠂔 𠂔 𠂔 have no attested existence outside dictionaries, yet they are not uninformative about words found in old texts. There is a family of words whose generalized sound I represent as M#T, where M is a labial initial (including the devoiced nasal m- that yielded a later uvular fricative /χ-), # is a vowel and T an apical final. These words mean disappearing, going away, diving, ducking under cover, dying, vanishing. They remind me of another family of words I analogously represent as M#K, having to do with darkness, smoke, fog, death, blackness, covering up, nonexistence, vanishing. I have seen other pairs of families, eg those for “bend” (see below, pp. xxxiii) that seem to show a similar contrast of T vs K. I ask if T is related to K by more than coincidence. Evidence on that question includes the graph 𠂔, but that is hard to see from how it is presented in 康熙字典 and 廣韻.

Graphs are inconsistent evidence

I say there is no system in Chinese writing. No principle of construction or use of Chinese graphs pervades their history. The closest we can get to one is the use of a graph for a spoken syllable, and there are sporadic exceptions to that, a graph writing more than one syllable and a graph writing less than one. We don’t know if the first Chinese writing was pictographic or ^a Of course it’s more complicated than that. It always is. Notice that 廣韻 distinguishes readings of two graphs that previous rime books treated as homophones: 搯 /yʷət and 𠂔 /yʷət. That opens the possibility that the 廣韻 editors, or some of them, distinguished 𠂔 /mʷət from 𠂔 /mʷət and that the scribal error of 土 for 亡 occurred in the transmission of the text of 廣韻 rather than before its compilation. What that would mean for Chinese historical phonology can be ignored here; my topic is what all this means for readers who get their Classical Chinese from dictionaries.

logographic or syllabic, so we can't tell what language it wrote. It may have been as different from Chou language as Cantonese is from Mandarin. Using faux-Peking readings for oracle bone graphs obfuscates that question. Theory-driven phonology blurs it even more.

For example, the idea that Chinese might once have been an inflected language has long inspired investigators. Some evidence supports it, just as evidence can be found to support nearly any idea one might form about old Chinese. But all such evidence is indirect, inferred from interpretations of the only direct evidence we have, text written in Chinese graphs. The graphs are such a chaotic jumble of the detritus of centuries that by picking a few choice bits one can assemble a proof of any theory at all, especially if one is willing to assume the truth of the theory beforehand. Even without begging the question, this linguistic jungle should not be mistaken for a garden, let alone as one of a single crop. All attempts I have seen to identify and dissect affixes were hothouse gardens with a few plants from this jungle. Some have transplanted conjectural elements from reconstructed old Vietnamese; others have imported bits of obsolete Tibetan spelling. These seekers of affixes have found what they went in search of because their very methods of search planted it there. The confusion and misdirection that arise from graphic variation make it easy to do that without necessarily noticing what one is doing. Meanwhile the evidence considered in full remains inconclusive.

Another idea is that each graph represents a word. (The theory that it does not matter how we pronounce the word appeals mostly to non-Chinese students.) The totemic ancestor of this one's adherents is The Father of Sinology, the author of 說文. From him we get our opinion that the majority of graphs consist of two parts, a signific and a phonetic. This opinion is another example of how we see not what is there but what we assume must be there.

As a GI my job was to translate thousands of words of Chinese into English every day. The English was batted out on a typewriter as fast as I could go. The Chinese was handwritten by people who also wrote fast: they scribbled. In all the time I did that work, and later taught it to others, I hardly recall seeing even one graph written out distinctly in the form in which it is printed in a dictionary. On the other hand, I saw many a case in which an entire utterance was represented by the squiggles of one long meandering pencil line. Far from being able to say which part of a graph was signific and which phonetic, I would have been hard put to specify the point on that line where one graph ended and the next began. I could not have read these utterances, of course, had I not first learned the words and the graphs used to write them, but that would not have been enough. I had to learn Chinese as a language. When I looked at a wiggly line on a page it produced in my head the sound of a voice speaking Chinese. I translated what that voice said into English. That is how anyone who knows a language reads it, regardless of how it is written. That is why proofreading, which ought to be easy, is in fact so difficult: a skilled reader normally only pays just enough attention to the writing for it to prompt that voice in the mind, so that misspellings, transpositions and the like are read right through without being noticed.

It is claimed that those wiggly lines call to mind proper discrete-stroke graphs which convey meaning. That belies my subjective experience. Comparing variants shows that if at some stage a cursive form was used in transcribing a graph, retranscription into discrete-stroke form can introduce so much variation that the graph loses its identity. I don't think 乏 b'iwǎp is phonetic in 眨 tsǎp; 乏 is a copyist's guess at a cursive form of 畚. (畚 is read sǎp by 康熙 citing 集韻.) In 𪗇 k'ǎp, 乏 replaces 去, while in 𪗈 b'iwǎp, 乏 is replaced by 𠂔.³

Thus though we may see that a graph contains a phonetic element, we can't always tell which element. For example, the slant and direction of the topmost stroke distinguishes 夭 from 夭. But slants and directions of strokes are varied for convenience in fast writing. All we can say of the cursive form 夭 out of context is that the phonetic looks more like 夭 than 夭. In context, we read the word—whichever it is—without applying a protractor.

Even a dot has an unpredictable importance. A dot distinguishes 玉 and 王, graphs that write unrelated words of dissimilar pronunciation. The same dot distinguishes 国 and 国, in which it is a distinction without a difference. The graphs which, if they had evolved less idiosyncratically, might now be written 二 and 二, are instead usually 下 and 上. But books exist in which they are printed 下 and 上. Who needs the dot? Who notices the difference between 殺 and 殺? One difference is that that dot distinguishes the Chinese zì from the Japanese ji. A Japanese reader must distinguish 井 and 井, graphs which to a Chinese reader are interchangeable. It is not enough to recognize the graphs. One must know the language. There are similar examples with the apostrophe in English, for example its distinguished from it's. Who reading The cat licked it's paw would insist on equating it's with it is? In examples like The Smith's went home a proofreader's eye would note a solecism but no one who knows English would see the possessive of Smith.

A stroke distinguishes 氏 from 氏. In the earliest forms of these graphs I can find, that was the sole distinction. Bernhard Karlgren, one of the stuffer upholders of the claim that there is a proper way to write each graph, splits these into two distinct phonetic series on his theory of regular development, which assigns one graph's Archaic reading final -r and the other final -g. I see that stroke as insufficient to support such a distinction. Karlgren notes that forms with 氏 and 氏 “are often confused in various editions.”^a I suggest they are interchangeable and should constitute one phonetic series.

The graphs 骹 'iwär'jwiq: and 骹 'iwēg'jwiq: “bent leg bones,” illustrate the complexity of this tangle, which a probably related homophone 委 does little if anything to sort out. There seem to be two sets of words that mean something to do with bending, a set with apical finals typified by 屈 k'iwət and one with velars typified by 曲 k'iwək. Thus no reading we might reconstruct for 骹 could shed light on the nature of the final of the word for “nine.” We cannot know that the 九 of 骹 is not a casual variant of 丸. (Cf [芄→]芄 in 淮南子.) Or it could be a variant of 九 wâng, in which case the right side might not be a phonetic at all but half of a dual-signific graph, bone + gimpy leg. The element 九 signifies just that in the graph 尫 for kwət “knee trouble,” in which 骨 is phonetic. Interdialectal homology of -k and -t is acoustically plausible, especially so if, as I think, the unvoiced finals in CC were unreleased; thus 尫 kwət might be related to 膕 kwek “bent knee.” And since Karlgren's k'iwət is plausibly rendered as k'iwət, I may end up deciding that a localized shift of -t to -k over time could have become a dialect difference, so the apical set and the velar set could be doublets of the same “bend” words, without altering my judgment (below, p. xlii) that “tapeworm” was only one word.

This leads to another objection to the claim that diachronically consistent phonetic elements indicate fine details of the pronunciation of the words they write. Not only is that not logically defensible as a canon of method, it is also not practically feasible as a way of interpreting the evidence we have to deal with. For example, if one wished to ask whether words in GSR phonetic series 12 (坐) might have had a final obstruent rather than being open syllables, a word one might want to consider in that regard is liwat “clumsy,” written with the graph 𠂔 or 𠂕. This is inadmissible evidence on the question. The word is also written with the graph 拙, and cursive forms of 出 and 坐 are similar. Flowing cursive forms of 坐 such as 𠂔 could as easily be cursive forms of 出 or of 生 or even of the 𠂔 variant of 乍. (Another flowing form, 𠂕, is of the variant 坐.) If 𠂔 is a casual variant of 拙 then the word liwat has nothing to do with series 12. Despite the clear distinction between 出 and 坐 in discrete-stroke forms, the more we learn about the history of Chinese writing the less we can be sure of what the phonetic in 𠂔 is.

Going on with series 12, consider 瘡 dz'wâ/dz'uâ “pustule.” (This definition is from the woefully unreliable 說文.) I wish to know if this word is related to others meaning various sorts of skin blemish or other surface roughness, such as ts'iang 瘡 “wound”, diang 瘍 “skin ulcer” and ts'iak 皸 “chapped skin.” If that association is demonstrable, my reconstruction would then become dz'wâg, showing the final velar common to this set of comparands. But if this word for “pustule” is related to these others, how is it related to the word for “skin ulcer” written 疥? The graph 疥 is not found in present-day versions of early texts, but given the cursive confusion between 𠂔 and 坐 just mentioned, it is open to question whether 疥 might have come down to us in the guise of 瘡.

The graph 瘡 writes a personal name of conjecturable pronunciation in the 春秋. In 荀子 it writes dz'wâ (my dz'wâr) “crime, offense”, more commonly written 坐. Its earliest use for a word that might mean “pustule” is in late 3rd C. BC. There is a dubious example in 呂氏春秋, and good examples in Han Fei Tzû 韓非子, a late chapter of 莊子, and 淮南子. My reading of these passages is that the word written 瘡 means not a pustule but peccant matter within a pustule or other skin abscess. That could associate this word with 臍 siwəd “sebum,” 髓 swia (my siwâr) “marrow,” and 髓 tsiwâ (my tsiwâr) “marrow” in comparand set 627, allowing the reconstructed reading dz'wâr.

I only find 疥 as the first syllable of words like 疥癩 and 疥腮. I relate 疥癩 to words like /ts'anga: 斥屃 “untoward,” while 疥腮 just might belong to our set of “ulcer” words if it came from an unattested doublet of dzwârts'iäg 瘡疽 “pus-filled abscess” with the two elements inverted. So the monosyllable at Mathews number 81 is either a distant reflection of ts'iäg or, far more likely, merely a word-fragment amputated by the monosyllabic myth.

The graph 𠂔 may be evidence for a final velar in series 12; in addition to readings like /ts'uâ and /dz'uâ, 廣韻 also gives it the reading /dz'uk, in which it is said to be interchangeable with 𠂔. The reading as well as the meaning of this definiens might have been assigned to its definiendum in pure carelessness, but I think this is an example of another pitfall for reconstructors of older Chinese, miscopied 反切. A single stroke distinguishes 昨木切 from 昨禾切, which yields /dz'uâ. Readings like dz'ian and dz'an for the graph 壙 seem to fit with final -r, but evidence that favors our ideas ought to be suspect. I suggest 壙 read with final -n is a casual variant of 壙, a scribal simplification of 壙 d'ian. Even more doubtful candidates for membership in series 12 are the graphs 壙 and 壙, both read 'wən, of which I suggest the phonetic is 'ien 壙. Note the resemblance of 里 and 壙 to the 壙 variant of 坐.

A systematic approach to Chinese writing like that in GSR is systematized reliance on the inherently unreliable. Consider phonetic series 1148 (焦). Detailed consideration of millions of words of Chinese text has led me to the opinion that there is no such phonetic element. There is a graphic element 焦 which, like 坐, has been used to write a variety of phonetic symbols. But unlike 坐, the graphic element 焦 has no phonetic role of its own apart from the other graphic elements whose place it may take. Some of its uses, as for example in 焦 tsiok

“torch,” are as a variant of 雀. Others such as in 樵 dz'ioŋ (my dz'ieŋ) “gather” are as a variant of 集. Nearly all -p words written with this phonetic now use the 集 variant, but as witness of a labial final there is 蘸 (variant 蘸) tsām. Also 鑣 (variant 鑣) is used for 鑣 tsiap in copy 3 of the Tunhuang 切韻.^a Series 31 (垂) may split between 坐 and 差 in a similar manner. (Note 垂 also occurs as a casual variant of 垂.)

Distinct graphs traceable to distinct early forms cannot be presumed to have always been kept distinct. When the Ch'un-ch'iu era began, Chinese graphs had already been developing for a thousand years. They wrote contrasting dialects in varied social environments, used by people of differing rank who had learned the graphs by rote to uneven standards of accuracy. They cannot have formed a simple standard system under those conditions. Confusion and conflation were already common. The view of phonetic elements as discrete entities, subject to rigid rules of usage, only changing with calligraphic fashion, when all change at once like a regiment of symbol-soldiers marching through history, is too tidy to accommodate the evidence.

Consider series 4 它 ← 𠄎 and 569 鬼 ← 𧈧. Through centuries, as each graph's later forms replaced earlier ones, the two never looked much alike, so that my guess that 鬼 is phonetic in 𧈧 seems absurd. That comes of a false perspective that views them in abstraction. Graphs with Archaic readings including kwər, g'wər, k'iwər, k'wər, and 'iwər have 鬼 as phonetic. Graphs with 畏 ← 𧈧 as phonetic have readings like 'wər, 'iwər, 'iwət and g'wər. Notation like 鬼 ← 𧈧 and 畏 ← 𧈧 can mislead. The graphs 𧈧 ← 𧈧 tsiət and 人 ← 𧈧 niən are not interchangeable, but as I have shown, that is not proof that 𧈧 and 𧈧 never interchanged. That arrow applies only to the forms of the graphs, not to their practical use. We do not know enough about the Shang language and the early Chou language to be able to decide if the distinction between 鬼 and 畏 is a later pedantic codification of earlier free variation or, on the contrary, the two graphs were always reserved for distinct words. (The same indifferent difference is shown by 見 ← 𧈧 kian and 畏 ← 𧈧 kən.) Noting that the 𧈧 element in 鬼 rewrites a 口 ← 𧈧 significant later added to 𧈧, I suggest GSR series 569 鬼 (and 600 裛 and 481 𧈧) should be merged with series 573 畏.

I read 𧈧 and 𧈧 as k'iwər and 𧈧 as 'iwər (see above, p. xxiv). If 它 tâ is phonetic in 𧈧 k'iwər this is sound change beyond the scope of GSR. I can read 𧈧 as 'iwər; for 𧈧 I have no 反切. The evidence for my guess is weak, mainly variant graphs from eclectic word-books, but it is consistent. Take 𧈧, which 康熙 quoting 集韻 plausibly calls a variant of 畏 (cf 食~倉~倉). In an old, worn, perhaps mildewed or worm-eaten scroll it would be easy see 由 as 山. And the unusual 𧈧 is ripe to be seen as the standard 𧈧. Then how far is 𧈧 from 𧈧, measured by the graphic variation demonstrated above (pp. xxv-xxvi)? In turn, 𧈧 is outlandish enough to be reanalyzed as the very familiar 它. The 𧈧 of 𧈧 is then just another graphic variant of 畏. (Note also 里 for 畏 in 裡 k'wər.) And there is 𧈧, which 康熙 quotes 集韻 as calling a variant of 會 g'wəd or kwəd, perhaps 畏 as loan-graph.

Another possibility is that 它 in 𧈧 is for 虫 χiwər. As phonetic 虫 mostly writes things like d'ioŋ, but 𧈧 χiwər is a counter-example. That wouldn't explain 𧈧. If the 𧈧 of 會 ← 𧈧 is a significant gather as in 合 then the 𧈧 might be phonetic. If 𧈧 is a Chou version of Shang 𧈧 then 𧈧 might be phonetic in 𧈧 ← 𧈧. (The 𧈧 in the 𧈧 variant of 𧈧 is not independent evidence. The 竹 is dubious; 𧈧 may be an attempt at something like 𧈧, with 𧈧 added later, making 𧈧 ← 𧈧 phonetic in 𧈧.) That would make 它 | 虫 phonetic in 𧈧~𧈧 and 畏 | 𧈧 phonetic in 𧈧. My guess of 𧈧 for all has fewer assumptions and better-attested evidence. Tracing 𧈧 as descendant specifically of 𧈧, 𧈧 or 𧈧 would require testimony from scribes who died long ago.

A juxtaposition of specific elements is not the only sort of phonetic. Another is a geometric alignment of a general type of graphic element. Well-known examples are 晶 and 磊. The concept of phonetic series might be extended to encompass such configurations. According to 說文 the phonetic element in both 焦 and 集 is 隹 as a scribal simplification of 隹 dz'jəp. I accept that as a good guess, adding that 焦 and 集 themselves might be scribal simplifications of 隹.^a Then if I united 隹 and 晶 and 磊 into one series, the same consideration would require me, for consistency, to unite 磊 and 晶 and 隹 and 聶 and 龍 into another series and to agree with 說文 in taking the phonetic element of 襲 to be 龍, as a scribal simplification of 龍. But 說文 speaking of 襲 writes 龍 as 龍. Some system!

Grammata Serica Recensa

When I began to study CC, my task was not ordinary language-study: no one could read old Chinese fluently. The promising research of the Ching philologists waned with the fall of the dynasty; the orientalist mumbo-jumbo of sinology, naïvely charming as it may be in dinner party anecdotes, cannot sustain an intellectually honest discipline. When I found Creel's "inductive method" to be a fatuous burlesque of genuine language teaching, I could only memorize long passages in faux-Peking readings. When I began my dissertation (Classical Chinese Word-Classes, Yale 1970), I was aware that systematic reconstruction of Old Chinese had been going on for decades. Rejecting sinological Pekinese for citations in that work, I did not attempt a reconstruction of my own. I used Archaic Chinese as the least unsatisfactory of the available systems.

Bernhard Karlgren's Grammata Serica Recensa groups characters into 1235 phonetic series, sets of characters containing the same phonetic element. (Series 1236 – 1260 contain characters for which Karlgren felt unable to reconstruct an Archaic reading.) For each character Karlgren gives one or more definitions, and provides readings from three eras:

人 njən/njən*/jen
古 ko/kuo*:/ku
帶 tād/tái*-/tai

The first, with the asterisk, is the Archaic form (early Chou); the middle one is Ancient Chin. (the language of Ch'ang-an around 600 A.D.); the third is modern Mandarin.^b

The toneless readings Karlgren calls "Mandarin" I call "sinological Pekinese." They are there for sinological reasons, and I ignore them. I omit Karlgren's asterisk. Where I cite the Ancient reading I precede it with the virgule that GSR employs as a separator, thus:

Archaic: 古 ko "old"
Ancient: 古 /kuo: "old"
Archaic and Ancient: 古 ko/kuo: "old"

The word in quotes is my gloss of the Chinese word cited.

GSR is a monument of Chinese studies,^c and like many monuments is less impressive seen up close. In George Kennedy's felicitous phrase, Karlgren's scholarship is "governed by powerful inner convictions."^d One is that Chinese "has not, as certain other languages, disyllabic or polysyllabic stem-words (kitchen, anchor)."^e GSR hacks dozens of monosyllables

^a It is more complicated than that: 集 read dz'jəp writes a word "to perch" related to 鷺 ljəb "grasp." Read dz'jəp it writes a word meaning "flock" related to dz'jəp 習 "replicate"; in the latter use it may be a simplification of 隹. We also find 隹 as a back-formation variant of 集.

^b Grammata Serica Recensa p. 4

^c A layman's appraisal: "Grammata Serica, a Chinese grammar, is a standard work even in China, and the Chinese have been able, thanks to [Karlgren's] researches, to reconstitute their badly eroded grammar and simplify their written characters." — Frank Ward, "Ancient Chinese Art," Scanorama Magazine Oct-Nov 1976, p. 21.

^d "The Butterfly Case," Wen-ti 8 (1955), repr. in Selected Works of George A. Kennedy (Far Eastern Publications, 1964), p. 295.

^e Sound and Symbol in Chinese, Hong Kong 1962 (repr. of 1923 ed.), p. 14.

out of disyllables. Nor is this butchery confined to disyllabic stem-words. From k'əmɣ'əm 頰頰 “hollow-cheeked,” Karlgren, apparently seeing a synonym-compound, defines both “hollow” and “cheek” as “emaciated”.

GSR does not define words. It defines an artificial construct, “Chinese characters”.^a In many cases GSR gives a literal translation of a commentator’s casual gloss. A good example comes from a commentary to Chuangtzu 莊子 by Kuo Hsiang 郭象 that glosses 無朕 as 無迹. If 迹 is not a copyist’s error, 郭象 read 朕 as a word meaning “evidence,” often written 朕. The scholiast Lu Te-ming 陸德明 provides 反切, 直忍反, that accord with this reading. The gloss “evidence” for 朕 ill fits the sense of its context, which advocates freeing the mind from preconceptions, but Karlgren accepts 直忍反 (which he reconstructs d'iən/d'iën;) and translates the additional gloss 兆 as “omen, sign.” He inserts this 朕 into series 893 (莽) with the comment that the final consonant is very enigmatic. It would not be enigmatic in series 450 (寅), which I combine with series 560 (矢). Both 矢 and 寅 are from an early 𠂔 or 𠂕, sometimes written 𠂔~𠂕 in modern graphs. This muddle gives the lexicographer (not the translator) a choice. If I reject the 反切 of 陸德明 and assign this 朕 to series 893, I can read it as d'iəŋ/d'z'iəŋ “boundary path,” also written 脛. If I accept 直忍反 and assign this 朕 to series 450, I can take it as an otherwise unattested doublet of 脛 liən/tsiën: “boundary path.” Taking 朕 to be a variant of 脛 requires fewer assumptions. (The two words for “boundary” might of course be related.) “Boundary” fits the sense better than “evidence” not only in this passage of 莊子 but also for similar occurrences of 朕 in 淮南子, including the one 郭象 parroted in his 莊子 gloss.^b

When I began to computerize this database in the 1980’s I still considered Archaic Chinese the least unsatisfactory of the published reconstructions, as I had in 1967 and as indeed I still do. Yet it will not bear the weight I have had to put on it. The more evidence I tried to fit into this system the more it creaked and groaned and finally cracked and broke down. Linguistics is not physics; inconsistencies, far from overthrowing a system, can even reassure us of its validity, if they are the sort of thing our experience with other languages would lead us to expect. But important pillars of Karlgren’s structure rest on no foundation in either fact or theory. Such are that the Odes adhere to a unitary rime scheme, that the voiced finals -b, -d, -g were still in the spoken language of the Odes, that reconstructed voiced finals must all be homorganic with the preserved unvoiced finals of words written with the same graphic phonetic element, that the readings given in 切韻 all come from a single contemporary dialect, that the 切韻 dialect is directly and regularly derived from the language of the Odes, and that all modern dialects derive directly from the dialect of 切韻.

The neogrammarians’ concept of regular development works forward through time. It is validated by empirical data. Karlgren’s version turns the time crank backward. Language does not work that way. Karlgren’s backward-cranking regular development makes no allowance for the mixture of dialects that goes on in all languages and that must have happened around and about Ch’ang-an, of all places, for a dozen reasons one could name offhand, between Archaic Chinese and Ancient Chinese. Dialect mixture is not lightly invoked: many comparisons of words and texts are needed to make such a determination in any given case. (I suggested examples above, pp. xxii-xxv.) In advance of such comparisons I think it prudent not to become rigidly committed to a formulaic reconstruction.

^a A revealing passage: “I have inserted here the Anc. Ch. tones of every character, not only its tone with its principal meaning...but also the tone variations it has undergone when used with other shades of meaning or as...phonetic loan character.”—Grammata Serica Recensa, p. 2. Note that the character is what has a meaning and a tone. That is not careless phrasing by Karlgren, but an accurate reflection of the sinological view.

^b A.C. Graham, by reading characters instead of language and analyzing commentary instead of text, adopted the same misreading, translating 體盡無窮而遊無朕 as, “Become wholly identified with the limitless and roam where there is no foreboding of anything” instead of, “Entirely exhaust the infinite and roam without bound.”—Chuang-tzu: the Inner Chapters, London: George Allen & Unwin, 1981, p. 98.

Riming in the Odes is not precise. Even with arbitrary assumptions, Karlgren must still accept many near-rimes, as -iòk with -iok and -wek, -ad with -âd and -ât and others not even that close. Karlgren notes that words written 心, 林 and 風 rime in the Odes, but while 心 and 林 continue to rime in 切韻, there 風 is found riming with 東. He reconstructs a reading for 風 which is close enough to that of 林 to allow for a rime in the Odes but different enough to allow for its separate development: making 林 gliəm, he makes 風 piùm. Compare a homophone of 林 in 切韻, written 臨. This word rimes with four others in Ode 258, 蟲蟲 d'ìong-d'ìong, 宮 kìong, 宗 tsông, and 躬 kìong. Three of these rime in 切韻 with 東 and one, 宗, with 冬. Give Karlgren credit that he does not take the easy way out, of denying that 臨 is part of the rime in this stanza. He marks it as a riming word^a and assigns it the reading bliəm based on his reading for 品, which he considers phonetic in this graph,^b and gives no explanation. Riming of 臨 and 宮 in Ode 258 is not hapax legomenon: the Chang Mên Fu 長門賦 of Szü-ma Hsiang-ju 司馬相如 has this sequence of rime words: 心音宮臨風淫陰音檐閨吟南中宮崇窮鍾.

Three centuries after 司馬相如, 張衡 rimed 楓 with 林; 切韻 rimes it with 東. In 切韻 are two readings for 彤 “sacrifice”: it rimes with both 林 and 東. In 廣韻 it rimes only with 東. In 釋名 both 汜 and 放 pun on 風. For some people at some times and places some words rime in -m and for other people, times or places, rime in -ng. Karlgren’s backward-cranking regular development cannot explain how some -iəm words became /-iung words, while some -iòng words contrarily became /-iəm words. Rather than demanding a simple explanation, I ask what more we can learn about -m and -ng in Chinese. Comparing hundreds of words in -m and -ng gives the impression of a deep and wide-ranging connection between these two finals, that may be synchronic as well as diachronic, that may include morphological sound-change as well as interdialectal loans, and that at any rate is neither simple nor regular (see below, p. lvii).

Karlgren rejects even the possibility of both open and closed syllables in a phonetic series. Where his backward-cranking regular development requires a non-homorganic final, he splits a series into two, eg 毆 and 醫, or 耳 and 聒, or 甫 and 博. I think some syllables he reconstructs with -g were open syllables, and in others -g is less plausible than -r or -d or -b.

I don’t believe Chinese passed through chokepoints at which a standard speech formed the sole ancestor from which a later blooming, buzzing confusion of tongues emerged. A blooming, buzzing confusion of tongues is the natural state of all languages at all times. A standard speech even in one large city, let alone over a whole nation, would be, not impossible, but so improbable as to require a historical explanation of how such an anomaly came to be. We are offered no explanation. I don’t believe the dissimilarity of languages spoken in widely removed places was less at any time in recent millennia than it is now. It is unlikely that Mandarin, Wu, Yüeh, and Sino-Xenic readings of Chinese graphs all stem from one dialect of one locality in one brief era.

Karlgren ignored Ancient tones in his reconstruction of Archaic. It may be that not only did tones not exist, but no nontonal precursor of them needs to be considered—for that is how GSR leaves the situation—but questions not asked tend not to be answered.

^a The Book of Odes, Stockholm 1950, p. 223

^b Grammata Serica Recensa p. 178. I suggest the phonetic is not 品 but 𠄎 which would put the graph in GSR series 836 (霽).

Karlgren's four-way system of initial contrasts, voiced versus unvoiced and aspirated versus unaspirated, might be more convincing as a three-way system after dialects have been sorted out. But which sounds were phonemically equivalent to which others is no simple question, and is further entangled with the problems of tonogenesis and of affixation; its answer is unlikely to take the simple form of dropping one of his four.

GSR has initial clusters that are subjectively plausible to those of us who speak languages that utilize consonant clusters. Considered in the light of comparands drawn only from Chinese, that plausibility decreases with increasing amounts of evidence. Put to the test of cross-comparison in a large data base, it vanishes. Working with comparands has convinced me that every initial cluster proposed for Archaic Chinese in GSR is a spurious artifact of some flaw in Karlgren's methods as applied inconsistently to an alphabet-mediated model (see below, p. xliii) of language change. I invoke these empirically grounded principles:

a. The phonetic elements of Chinese graphs have nothing to do with etymological relations among Chinese words (see above pp. xxxiv-xxxix). Phonetic series are mere heuristic contrivances that help us learn to read. That two words are written with graphs in the same phonetic series, even homophones with the same graph, has no etymological significance.

b. Any part or all of a graph can be varied by a casual copyist (see above, pp. xxxvi-xxxix). Therefore two modern graphs having the same identical element as phonetic cannot be blindly assigned to the same phonetic series without the risk of distorting our evidence.

c. A graph that has acquired a spurious reading (see above, pp. xiii-xiv) must not be assigned to any phonetic series when given that reading.

d. One and the same graph may write entirely unrelated words; one and the same word may be written with entirely dissimilar graphs (see above pp. xiii-xiv). Thus a method that depends on the assumption that Chinese graphs were devised in one place in a brief era and then used consistently over the following millennia must yield to methods that have been developed in historical linguistics for comparing words.

First, the principle of paucity of entities tells against reconstructing homorganic initial clusters on no more evidence than phonetic series. In the great majority of series are words with contrasting homorganic or nearly homorganic initials. We do not know what significance, if any, to attach to such concurrence, and many a midnight lamp must burn before such evidence is properly sorted out. Until then, if 720 易 diang can be phonetic in 傷 siang and 暢 liang, I see no need to reconstruct initial clusters for series 730 襄. The clusters sn- (eg 134 需) and sn- (eg 730 襄) depend on the implausible development of Archaic n- to Ancient n̄z-. (See below, p. xlix.) The relation between Ancient /s- and Archaic s- is still not clear to me, but I see ziu as phonetic in siu with no cluster needed. I concede that old Chinese might have had initial clusters such as l- and n-. I deny that their existence could be demonstrated solely by the evidence of phonetic series; thus I accept the null hypothesis.

Second, the graphic variation that is ubiquitous in Chinese writing compels caution about identifying phonetic series. Karlgren reconstructs an initial ml- cluster for words he puts into series III₄. I have to disagree: the 卯 in 質 is not the same phonetic as in 留. There is a variant of 留 written 畱 with a form of the phonetic 畱 that occasions some difficulty. The claim in the entry for 酉 in 說文 that 畱 is a variant of 酉 is untenable, as is shown by the presence of 𪚩 rather than 畱 in Karlgren's examples III₄ n-o. But Karlgren jumps to a false conclusion through a fallacy he commits again and again, the assumption that evidence that impeaches a competing theory thereby confirms his own theory.

This is a convenient point to address a problem that bedevils those who try to learn CC by sinological methods, namely that many hundreds of the graphs, among them some of the most common, are used to write more than one word. How is that possible? It depends on how much the distributions of the words overlap. The number six, for example, will occur in a set of contexts practically identical to those in which we would find the number seven. We could not use the same symbol to write both numbers and expect anyone to know which we meant. But if we use the same symbol for six and door we can assume no one who knows the language would read His six is the doorth one from the left. Yet there would still be some chance of confusion, and I think that is what we find in series III₄.

The cyclical character 卯 is one of a sequence of twelve that combine with a sequence of ten to form a cycle of sixty. The number sixty seems to have no particular significance in Chinese culture, but it was the basis of an arithmetic developed far to the west of China, in the same region from which came chariots and compound bows. Most early Chinese graphs are stick-figure drawings of things: a horse, an eye, the moon, a flowing stream. Few of these 22 symbols strike me as in that tradition. I would not be surprised if archaeological investigation could someday establish a line of transmission of these symbols into China from the west. Thus I find it interesting that 許慎, author of 說文, saw the precursor of 卯 as a drawing. To identify the word (which has no meaning whatever except for its position in the sequence) instead of a non-existent definition he makes a pun in the style of 釋名: 卯冒也二月萬物冒地而出象開門之形故二月爲天門 “môg [cyclical] is môg ‘cover.’ In the second month everything springs forth, covering the ground. [The graph] looks like an open door. Thus the second month is a door to the sky.” Now 卯 does look a bit like 𠂔 turned inside-out, as if the leaves of the door had been pushed wide open. Thus we have an easily recognizable pun, an explanation of the pun, an analysis of the graph and a clue to the usage of the word. There is nothing irregular about any of it.

What needs explaining is the claim (rejected by Karlgren^a) in the 說文 entry for 酉 that anciently 酉 – 酉 was written 𠂔 – 卯. The association of 酉 with a door, like 卯, can be explained by Han notions of cosmology, but equation of the graphs 𠂔 and 酉 is uncalled for unless there was a graph that looked like 𠂔 and was read like 酉. If there was, I can put my finger on just the word it would have been used to write: 牖 zîôg (my diab) “window”. Already in the time of 許慎 this word was written with a direct ancestor of the modern graph. I do not find it written with any other graph in extant texts. But the assumption that long before the 2nd C AD there had been a graph that looked like 𠂔 and was read like 酉 would account for both the phonetic element of 留 and the puzzling remark in 說文. (Cf the parallel situation with 門 used to write both mwən and, as a casual variant of 𠂔, a phonetic element of graphs read liën.)

This raises the question of whether Karlgren was hasty to dismiss 說文 summarily without considering whether there might have been a factual basis for this seemingly idle remark. And that question brings enough doubt to Karlgren’s conflation of m- and l- initials to prompt me to accept the null hypothesis. I suggest a new series, I₄₂₃, for the l- initial words in series III₄, leaving only the m- initial ones, and discarding the spurious reading of klôg for 窮.

Karlgren reconstructs an initial bl- cluster. Do near-synonyms like 並 b’ieng “side by side” and 兩 liang “pair” show the distribution of such a cluster between dialects? How about 冰 piəng “ice” and 冷 liəng “cold”? Two words for “writing-brush” mentioned in 說文, 聿 bīwət (楚 dial.) and 不律 piŭgbīwət (吳 dial.) might show bīwət irregularly^b becoming liwət in 楚 dialect and dimidiation in Boodberg's sense^a of pl- in 吳 dialect (if these words exist at all, which I would not assume of anything in 說文 without corroboration). But some evidence for bl- might stem from the confusion of graphic elements we saw illustrated above in the case of 卯, such as 京 for 稟 or 品 for 卯. If series 502 聿 is spatchcocked from distinct phonetic elements, there is no bl- cluster in 律 nor a pl- cluster in 筆. The “brush” words in 說文 may instead show initial d- in 楚 and a compound word in 吳. That is, there may be three words for “brush,” two unattested outside 說文: 筆 piət “writing-brush” related to 拂 p'iut “cleaning-brush,” 聿 d'iwət^b “brush” (楚 dial.) related to 棼 dziwəd “broom,” and 不律 piurliwət “brush-tube” (吳 dial.) related to 拂 p'iut “brush” and to 籥 liwət “pitchpipe or blowpipe.” (For the relation between 筆 and 拂, note that 說文 says the 燕 dialect word for “writing-brush” is 弗 piut). The graphic resemblance between early forms of 聿 and 筆 does not seem to me so convincing of the commonality of their phonetic element as it once did, so I make this series into two, one with apical and one with labial initials, just as I split series III₄ 卯 and perhaps others along the fault line of initial apicals and labials. Series 178 might split three ways: 彎 wan 變 pian and 蠻 mwan. The parallels mentioned at the beginning of this paragraph can be explained in other ways. It could be that 並 b'ieng “side by side” is related to words like 辟 p'iək “beside” while 兩 liang “pair” is related to words like 絡 glâk “connect.” The relation of 冰 piəng “ice” to 冷 liəng “cold” is complicated by the existence of 凝 ngiəng “freeze,” 凜 g'liəm “cold” and 凜 g'liəm “cold,” which might make 冷 gliəng. Karlgren's hypothetical bl- initial cluster is plausible, but his evidence for it is not. I accept the null hypothesis. (See below, pp. lvi-lviii.)

^b That is, irregularly according to the backward-cranking development mill of GSR. But perhaps regularly according to a more traditional philological analysis; see below, pp. lviii–lix.

Third, phenomena routinely encountered in languages are slighted by alphabet-mediated models of sound change. One such is that an obstruent can be replaced by another with a distinct point of articulation, because the sound they make is heard as nearly the same. Some non-homorganic Ancient Chinese initials such as $\chi-$ and m- within a phonetic series (eg 17 麻) do not need the hypothesis of initial clusters. The $\eta-$ sound made by devoicing m- sounds much like $\chi-$, even though the points of articulation are very different. I see another example of that with initial l- and initial velars (symbolized collectively as K-) as in series 766 各.^c

Karlgren's criterion for initial clusters in such a series is not clear. In some series with both initial l- and initial velars he reconstructs initial clusters:

76 呂	351 果	655 林	855 鬲
77 旅	609 監	694 立	1015 牟
123 婁	613 僉	755 京	1069 琴
185 東	627 兼	766 各	1125 樂

and in some he does not:

1 可 (eg 砢 lâ)	668 稟 (eg 凜 g'iəm)	992 九 (eg 琿 liôg)
53 户 (eg 炉 lo)	823 令 (eg 欵 χiəng)	993 久 (eg 吹 liôg)
55 乎 (eg 杼 lo)	928 力 (eg 勑 g'iək)	1068 咎 (eg 縉 liôg)
313 蜀 (eg 臍 lâp)	931 革 (eg 革 lək)	1172 工 (eg 岷 lung)
470 倫 (eg 論 kwən)	979 𦉳 (eg 𦉳 χiək)	1208 泉 (eg 𦉳 kük)

^a See my critique of this device as employed by Paul Serruys below, pp. xliii-xlvi.

^b Or perhaps biwət after all. See below, p. lix.

^c Some of the examples in what follows may be suspect as possible artifacts of confusion between 力 and 加 as initial 反切 graphs. The 口 element of 加 can be reduced in handwriting to a little squiggle that a copyist might overlook.

The score is cluster I6, no-cluster I5, nearly a tie. (We see the same inconsistency of cluster and no-cluster in series with both K- and S- initials, eg 346 歲 and 864 支. See my note under 稜 diam below, p. 475 col I.)

More interesting are comparands with initial l- and initial velars. There are pairs of words that are synonyms and exact homophones except for the contrast of initial K- versus l-. Here is a taste of the smorgasbord of comparands with K- and l- initials that can be assembled.

Word	K- initial	l- initial	Word	K- initial	l- initial
“direct route”	徑	衍	“carve”	刻	勒
“neck”	頸	領	“arrive at”	詣	戾
“C. Asian”	胡	虜	“scrape”	搗	掣
“admirable”	傑	裂	“defective”	缺	劣
“shelter”	居	廬	“attach”	繫	麗
“understand”	曉	了	“ship”	航	艤
“group”	群	倫	“forfend”	扞	攔
“bent bone”	觥	癢	“hit”	擊	攏

Only one of the words in this table, 攔, is written with a graph from a phonetic series for which GSR gives Kl- clusters. Are we to bung clusters into the other series as well? There are more such pairs, and there are even more in which the vowel quality is close but not an exact match, such as these:

Word	K- initial	l- initial	Word	K- initial	l- initial
“category”	彙	類	“trigger-catch”	機	椽
“mus. note”	角	齧	“all”	均	淪
“carry on shoulder”	肩	揸	“wail in grief”	吟	臨
“desire”	願	戀	“bind round”	緯	累
“plow”	機	犁	“fruit”	果	耒
“bind”	緊	縈	“clear”	潔	洌
“flail”	枷	羅	“grasp”	挾	攏

If we don't insist on an exact match for either the vowel or the meaning, allowing plausibly similar pairs such as 角 kük “antlers” and 鹿 luk “deer” or 疆 kiang “boundary” and 量 liang “measure”, we could easily wind up pasting a g- onto every word in GSR that now has a simple l- initial. We need to keep in mind that language change does not work through letters of the alphabet; it works through movements of the speech organs and perception by the ears. Concurrence of both initial l- and initial velars in a phonetic series is insufficient evidence on which to base a reconstruction of initial clusters. (See below, pp xlix-l.)

After GSR

Karlgren's reconstructions were accepted by many as validly done by reliable methods. As such, they were taken as evidence on which to base investigation of the possible relation of Chinese to other languages. Claims of such relationship emerged in profusion: Tibetan, Burmese, Thai, Austronesian...I have yet to encounter proto-Sino-Siberian, but it would not surprise me. I am far indeed from denying the possibility of such relationships; on the contrary, I affirm that the search for them is a prime task of philology. But faulty reasoning should be avoided in that search as in other fields of scholarship. Chinese must be done properly if another language is to be compared to it.

For some phonologists, sound change consists of two letters connected by an arrow. Such an alphabet-mediated model may have little to do with the actual making of human speech sounds. If used as a frame to support a display of data for further consideration, it can lead to insight, but as the goal of a study such a model is not likely either to be very enlightening or to have any but superficial validity for the body of data as a whole.

The words of a language can be sorted into synchronic and diachronic structures. Synchronic structures include patterns of inflection such as declension and conjugation; in CC they are virtually limited to patterns of phrase structure and compound-forming. Diachronic structures include patterns of word-derivation. To confuse words themselves with their written symbols is an elementary error in applying linguistic science that blurs what might have been clear divisions in structural word-grouping. Sinology has been confounded by that simple blunder for centuries. One of its many lamentable results is GSR's focus on characters instead of words. Reconstruction in the mode of GSR barely scratches the surface of philological inquiry into old Chinese. As a body of collated data, GSR is valuable. Hardly a day in my work goes by that I do not consult it. As a work of historical linguistics it is so deficient that I do not accept it as validly done by reliable methods. (Not the least of my objections to it is that its magisterial scope and depth established its alphabet-mediated inquiry into character-readings as the standard form in which research into old Chinese is to be done.)

I no longer pay any attention to work of Karlgren's successors, having found major examples of it to be pervaded by the flaws that blemish GSR. Any proto-Sino-whatsic based on such work contains too much proto and not enough Sino. To illustrate that, I will briefly consider as a typical example a successor work that was expanded from the PhD dissertation of Paul L-M. Serruys, whose vigorous mind had the misfortune to fall under the influence of Peter Boodberg, the Immanuel Velikovsky of sinology. In contrast with the roughly contemporary study of the 釋名 by Bodman^a, Serruys's study^b of the 方言 (see above, p. xx) not only presents and analyzes data from a Han-era word-book, but also goes on to extend the GSR reconstructions far into speculative territory. This book is a hard slog to read. It is written at a high level of abstraction in a toplofty Latinate style containing appeals to authority that are not integrated into the text but merely given as footnotes. Other unsupported assumptions besides the flaws I mentioned above underlie this work in place of the well-tested and verified data that ought to be its foundation. Serruys presented dogmas of sinology as resolutions of what, to many, are empirical questions of fact. "The literary text could by virtue of the Chinese script always dissociate itself from the spoken form,"^c is a primal meme of sinology that has never been empirically demonstrated. Another baseless sinological dogma is idolatry of 說文, of which he went so far as to say "its mistakes may have meaning."^d

A striking feature of Serruys's work is his carefully formulated abstract accounts of considerations that would tend to impeach a source of evidence.^e They are insightful, well-informed and clear. What is striking about them is that each is followed by Serruys's declaration that he will use a source regardless of such cogent objections. I don't deny that data known to be flawed may nonetheless be used, but carefully, cautiously, as if treading thin ice. It does not do to assert flatly, having laid out grounds for doubting Karlgren's Ancient Chinese, that his results “stand and could be proposed as faits acquis.”^a Saying it in French added no validity to that arbitrary claim.

The fallacy of affirming the consequent permeates Serruys’s work. For example, when he included the identification of parts of speech in an explanation^b, he tacitly implied that parts of speech in old Chinese had already been isolated and identified, not troubling to inform his readers how that might have been done. At that time no one claimed to have done it, and prevailing opinion was that it could not be done.^c Serruys called his work “a posteriori argumentation”^d There is nothing wrong with guessing at a solution to a problem. But a guess is not research. To qualify it as research the guess needs to be tested against independent data. A way must be found to generate falsifiable predictions from it, and determined efforts must be made to find facts that tend to falsify them. Any assertion that two old Chinese words are cognate—including my own such claims—amounts, in the present state of research, to a prediction that if the requisite work is ever done, such a relation will turn out some day to be demonstrable. I have set out to do such work, and in the next two sections I will show how I think it can be done. Serruys shirked that job, tacitly pretending that it had already been done and that he and his mentor Boodberg were privy to its outcome.

From his empyrean overview, Serruys descended to consider words one by one. Intermediate levels such as that of utterances in connected text drew little of his attention. He adduced hundreds of old Chinese words in this book; I do not find even one of them given in the context of an utterance from a text. He avoided phenomena in the real-life working of language, dealing in generalities far removed from how anyone ever spoke any language, eg “frequently complicated and sometimes hypothetical monosyllabic forms [that “sometimes” is fine, isn’t it?], which in some extreme cases cannot be considered as anything more than general formulae of word structures.”^e By “general formulae” he meant not paradigms of inflection displaying patterns of ablaut or affixation, but reconstructed syllables like “/l̥ymən*, bl̥g(w)ən, bl̥y̯ə^{mz} > -ei, lkmən, lqmən, p̥ylwən”^f that are too complicated to be plausible.

At the level of concrete detail, Serruys’s work was deficient in what sinologists like to call philology, namely textual criticism that seeks the most reliable wording of texts (see above, p. xiii). Graphic variation is ignored, eg 坐 taken as phonetic in 墜^g (see above, p. xxxiv) and 兮 taken as phonetic in 矜^h (see above, p. xxv). Miscopying of 反切 is ignored, eg reading 銚 as dz’uk^l (see above, p. xxxiv). He thought and wrote at an intellectual altitude from which such details on the ground are hard to make out. One needs to sort through old texts word by word as if sorting grapes, keeping the good and discarding the bad, to learn to spot faulty data in context of language. (See above, pp. xxvi-xxviii.) I see scant evidence of language study in this book. Throughout his chapter on “Preliminary Remarks” he does not cite even one single utterance from a Chinese text to illustrate his points.

Launching his forays into the jungle of words, he delivered pronouncements on matters many consider empirical questions to be resolved by weighing evidence, not by arbitrary declarations. He also flatly rejected basic precepts of historical reconstruction. Examples:

“[Chinese script] forces us to express all the Hsh contacts in terms of phonetic elements clustered around one syllabic core.”^k (Or in plain English, “Don’t expect me to apply the principle of paucity of entities to the structure of my reconstructed syllables.”)

^g Ibid., p. 16

“The first [important principle] is that a reduction of words, as found in the monosyllabic forms, must not always be of the same nature.”^a (Or in plain English, “Don’t expect me to demonstrate a consistent method of reconstruction.”)

“The second consideration is that...both developments binom > monosyllable and monosyllable > binom must be considered equally possible...”^b (Or in plain English, “Don’t expect me to crank the time handle in the standard direction.”) One can imagine a historical development in which supine → spine while spur → super, but that would not fit easily with the general picture of language change worked out over centuries by philologists and linguists, and would require independent evidence, not mere conjecture.

“The binoms, being real world units written by two graphs, can only be reconstructed on the assumption that these binoms were attempts to represent more clearly a word structure which the monosyllabic stem indicated only in forms too reduced and compact.”^c (Or in plain English, “After millennia of trying to write their own language they still hadn’t figured out how to do it, but their clumsy attempts incorporated recondite phonetic clues that only Boodberg and I can discern.”)

Now to his “comparative method”. “The method then to obtain to some extent the real word form hidden behind a binom must consist of two steps: to list according to time and sources the words written by means of two graphs, and to identify them whenever possible with a corresponding monosyllabic form, reconstructed from one graph, which alone and by itself is clearly used for the binom; to compare the two graphic representations (the binom and the simple graph) and deduce a reconstruction, which in one form is extremely reduced and compact, in the other more extended and complete.”^d

Discussing his equations of monosyllables and binoms, he presents the pair 汎 and 汎濫. Reconstructing a monosyllable */p’lwām, he notes that the vowel of 汎 differs from that of 濫 and adds, “It is natural to ask if there was also another monosyllabic form //bglām?*”^e Natural is as natural does; there are millions of people to whom it would be natural to ask whether space aliens had anything to do with it. What I find natural is to ask to see each word in context. I was led to expect him to show me that by this declaration: “It is clear that each case is to be investigated and decided in the light of every available shred of evidence in the history of the word.”^f Well said! Every available shred of evidence—the heart thrills to see such a brave gonfalon unfurled. Nor was that an idle boast. All he had to do was to walk upstairs in Durant Hall to the East Asiatic Library to find that evidence. He didn’t do it. He ignored the real world use of his “real world units”. By “sources” he meant only mere word lists, not texts meant to be read as connected language.

He justifies comparing 汎 and 汎濫 by claiming they mean the same thing, “to overflow, float.”^g (I assume this comma is for a semicolon and that he did not mean to imply that overflow is a rough synonym of float.) To see his comparison in perspective, note that there are cases in which we can be reasonably sure that merging or splitting of syllables did occur. The first are called fusion words; the second are called 反語. In the case of fusion words, we believe the binom and the monosyllable are the same word because we find them in free variation in context. In neither case do I see evidence of writers selecting graphs hinting at the meaning of the word concerned. Sound was the only consideration in writing 之 + 於 as 諸 or in spelling 東 as 德 + 紅.

Texts show a more complicated situation with the graphs 汎 and 濫 than Serruys's account allows for. Both graphs have multiple readings and overlap the usage of other graphs, eg 泛,汎 and 滄,瀆. (Examples of all these are given in the dictionary portion of this volume.) Some we can ignore as unlikely to be relevant, eg the use of both graphs to write place names (though I can't help wondering whether to refer to inhabitants of p'ylwām as p'ylwāmians or p'ylwāmites). As to the words I see in 汎濫, the first means neither “float” nor “overflow”. It is an ergative verb meaning “expand”, with comparands like 凡 b'iwām “extending to all cases” and perhaps also 放 piwang “release, abandon”, given the contact between -m and -ng I mention elsewhere (see above, p. xxxviii, below, p. lvii). The second word is a neutral verb meaning “overwhelm”, with comparands like 函 g'am “contain; conceal” and 滄 glām “immerse”, (The /l- initial of “immerse” in Ancient is not reduced from an Archaic gl- cluster but is instead a probable regular development from a lenited initial g-; see above, pp. xli-xliii, below, pp. xlviiii-xlix.) Thus in 汎濫 I see not one syllable unpacked into two, but two distinct words joined in a compound, spread + inundate; that is “to flood (sc a river or lake)”. I get that by comparing real words attested in texts with other real words attested in texts. What does Serruys get?

Thus p'iwām-lām* represents a most simple form, and *##p'ylwām a most reduced and complicated one. In between we could range other forms, equally deducible from the comparison of the two sides of the equation, so as to obtain a schema:

1. *##p'ylwām //bglām*
2. */p'ylwām-lām ~ */p'ylwām-glām (l'ýâmb) ~ //b'ýwām-glām* (l'ýâmb)
3. p'iwām-lām* lām^a

This looks like fun. Try it with an English example, “Candy is sweet.” Even a duffer like me can construct a monosyllable conjoining candy and sweet as *##csyweeandt; an adept might add gum drops and peanut brittle to the proto-form. With no reality-check to test them, Serruys's imaginary Chinese words are only a silly game like this one. He had no “comparative method” because he had no method. He just made things up. Sinology having no ethic that prohibits doing that, such games were played by others also through much of the twentieth century and are still played today. There is no need to consider any more of them in detail. My opinion of the whole genre can be summed up in one monobinom of reconstructed Yiddish: nbs.

Comparands

For examples of how I choose comparands, see how the graphs 帥 and 草 mentioned in the context of “knowing characters” (see above, p. xiv) can illustrate contrasts between the old-fashioned traditional sinological approach and the even more old-fashioned philological approach. Karlgren's evidence for final -r in series 559 (帥) is that 帥 rimes in the Odes with other words for which he reconstructs final -r. Without assuming that all odes are in the same dialect and all voiced finals were still present in that dialect, there is no more evidence for -r in 帥 than there is for -b, -d or -g. Noting that the phonetic element in this graph is 帥 tsəp, I consider words with labial rather than apical finals as comparands.

When translated “army,” 帥 occurs often as object of 帥 sl'iwət (my š'iwət) “to lead (an army).” The similarity of the graphs is misleading. The 帥 element in 帥 might be signific, perhaps meant for 追 tiwər “pursue.” The 帥 element of 帥 is probably phonetic twər. 說文 glosses 帥 as “kerchief” and says it is also written 悅 š'iwad. That would make the 帥 element the “cloth” signific. This 帥 writes sl'iwəd (my š'iwəd) “leader (of an army),” which I compare to 遂 dziwəd “go | send forth.” The relation between -d and -t in pairs like šiwəd “leader” and šiwət “to lead” is one I would love to be able to explain.

The word for what we usually mean by army that would be used to express ideas like army life, armed service, military law and the like is not 師 but 軍 kjwən. Both 兵 piǎng “weapons” and 武 miwo “martial” can express the idea army in certain idioms. There are other words, for instance 旅 gliə (my gliəg) “expedition.” The word written 師 means not “army” in general but a force for a specific mission, and the mission is almost invariably one of attack, not defense. (After the regularizing and tightening of military discipline by Ch’in, the term came to be applied to an army unit of a specific size and organization, but before that it meant any attacking force.) Words with an apical initial and a labial final meaning something like “attack” are easy to find. Two common ones are 侵 ts’iəm “encroach” and 襲 dziəp “invade.” I have put them in a set of comparands sharing the general idea of insertion. So my suggested reconstruction for 師 “strike force” is šjəb.

As for “capital city,” the expression written 京師 refers to the royal Chou capital. I suggest this is a fusion of 京所於立 kiǎng šjə iə gliəp “where the capital was set up,” with voicing of the final. That is, not the original Chou capital but the capital-in-exile set up after they were chased out of the original one. So I make this word kiǎngsliəb. For “teacher,” I see no relation to any word I know for “teach.” Noting that the word also means “orchestra leader,” I suggest the fusion of 所於立 works here too, taken to mean “one by whom established.” The meaning “blind man” is said to come from the traditional blindness of these musicians. So “teacher” and “music-master” and “blind” are also sliəb.

I suggest the graph 草 writes three distinct words. The one for “cursive” seems easiest. Evaluating 草 as a comparand of 蓬 (variant 筊) dz’əp “cursive” yields a set that includes 暫 dz’əm “brief,” 寔 tsəm “fast,” and 眨 ts’əp “quick eye motion,” so I reconstruct ts’əb for “fast (sc writing).” (That tips the balance of indecision on whether to relate 早 tsōg “early, soon” to words like 速 suk “speedy” with a final velar or to make it tsəb in this set, but since 草 is not a very early graph, I am ready to rescind that assignment given more data. Words like 樵 tsōk “grain harvested early” are not to be ignored, but neither is the possibility that 早 is phonetic in 覃 d’əm “extend” and 戛 djəm “sharp-pointed.”) “Rough” is less obvious. I find words like 麤 ts’o “coarse,” 粗 dz’o “rough,” and 剝 dz’u “cut into coarse bits,” none of which shows evidence of having had a final obstruent. The form of the graph 麤 tempts me to reconstruct a final labial based on the parallel with 轟 (above, p. xxxix) but I resist. In GSR, Ancient /-əu is never cranked back to an open syllable, but that is in GSR. I put “rough” in this set and assign it an open syllable. For “weeds” I defer choice. Weeds differ from other plants in too many salient ways to allow me to choose one and look for comparands among words with that sort of meaning. Weeds are coarse compared to vegetables, so we might consider the set of “rough” words. Weeds sprout sooner than many cultivated plants, so we could try a set of “fast” words, either ts’ōg or ts’əb. Weeds grow in thickets unlike cultivated plants, so we might look at 叢 and comparands making it ts’ōg, or at 雜 and comparands making it ts’əb. Herbaceous plants are more pliable than woody plants, so we might look at 翼 and comparands making it ts’əb. The last seems most plausible, but my choice awaits further evidence.

That illustrates the comparison of words and graphs needed in the reconstruction of any word of older Chinese before the questions of dialect and chronology are addressed, as in turn they must be answered before any reconstruction can be offered as part of an etymology. It is laborious work, with many false starts and turnings-back from blind leads. Claims like Karlgren’s regular development must emerge from amassed evidence rather than being assumed a priori. Magic affixes are unacceptable shortcuts in this task. No wonder sinologists prefer to rely on their own in-house methods rather than adopting those worked out by generations of philologists and linguists. To the nescience we share as part of the human condition, sinology adds its own form of self-inflicted ignorance. It must be gratifying to be able to answer so many questions by simply not troubling to ask them. Sinologists can be so innocently ingenuous about it that it seems harsh to point out that it is a form of cheating, but really one can't think what else to call it. (To be fair, sinology has no tradition of detailed large-scale comparative work, nor any incentive for sinologists to do it.)

Comparative reconstruction

Karlgren's backward-cranking rule that the Archaic reading of any word written with a given phonetic must also be the Archaic reading of all its homophones in 切韻 written with the same phonetic is unsustainable. For example, piug/piu 夫 “plebeian,” cognate to words like b'ïük/b'ïuk 服 “submit,” is not related to piwâr/piu 夫 “husband,” which is cognate to words like piər/pji- 比 “associate.” The word miwâr/miu: 舞 “dance,” cognate to miwät/miüät 物 “variegated pennon” and miwâr/χjwei 揮 “to flutter a pennon,” (as figurines and murals attest) is unrelated to miwäg/miu: 舞 “window lattice,” which is cognate to words like miwang/miwang: 网 “net.” The word 'iäb/iwo- 於 “satiated” is cognate to words like 'iam/iäm- 厭 “satiated,” not to 'iwâr/iwo 萎 “wither,” a doublet of 'iwâr/jwie 萎 “wither.”

The evolution of my proposed Archaic -b to Ancient -u by lenition of the stop closure is simple. I get candidates for Archaic -ab, for example, by examining Ancient -au words for comparands to Archaic words in -ap and -am. Where Ancient -u seems to be related to Archaic -t, -r or -n, the Ancient -u would likely derive from the nature of the Archaic vowel rather than the articulation of the lost voiced final. That would imply Archaic finals such as -ur, -ut contrasting with -wər, -wät. Unlike the case of Archaic -uk vs -wək, whose voiced versions -ug and -wæg yield Ancient -əu and -uəi, no Archaic contrast of -ut vs -wät has obvious reflexes in 切韻, which does not prove that no dialect ever had such a contrast. I postulate a small number of such words as b'ïür/b'ïü: 婦 “wife,” cognate to p'iwär/p'jwei 妃 “consort,” on the shaky evidence of the contrast in 切韻 of -iüät (物韻) vs -iüät (術韻) and the firmer evidence of comparands which is now being developed.

The metathesis of -au to -ua is still just a guess. The only evidence I have for it yet is the number of likely-seeming comparand-sets it could account for. But when, where and how it may have occurred are questions that cannot be addressed by theory. There must be detailed, case-by-case consideration of every riming pair in the entire corpus, sorted by dialect and date. To do that we need to recognize that our present account of Archaic readings includes many ill-founded assumptions. There are hundreds of words for which Archaic readings are taken for granted although they do not occur as rimes in the Odes, because of their homeography and homophony in 切韻 with another word that does.

Thus we cannot establish a word's older pronunciations from the phonetic element of a graph used to write it without knowing when and by whom that graph was used to write that word. I reject the claim that all words whose graphs contain a common phonetic must have homorganic finals. A phonetic whose Ancient Chinese final-stop forms all end in -k may be used to write an Ancient open syllable which etymological investigation might assign an earlier -d, not -g. Of four graphs that write /γuəi “tapeworm,” two (蛔, 痾) point to Archaic g'wər while two (蛭, 蛭) point to g'wæg. Even if no textual evidence favors one or the other, common sense reinforces the principle of paucity of entities in suggesting that it must have been one of the two, and that a graph that points to the other was used later, after voiced finals had become open syllables. I will not assume without evidence that -g and -r forms of the same word co-existed, and I say these graphs by themselves are flimsy evidence.

An Archaic reading with final -d for 替 does not imply that graphs with the phonetic 虎 all write words with final -d as well, despite the use of 替 and 遞 to write Ancient doublets /tʰei- and /dʰei- “discard and replace.” We must know when and by whom each graph was used for what word before we make such a claim in any individual case.

In extending Karlgren’s Archaic Chinese, I omit none of the consonants or vowels he proposed. I let them combine in ways not in the GSR system, by allowing final -b, -d and -r with a wider range of vowels. I append my reconstruction to Karlgren’s thus: 古 ko (my kâb) “old.” I hate to add to the rickety stage-machinery that clutters Chinese historical phonology, but I need such means to show the possible etymological connections that abound in this corpus. My extensions to GSR, in appendix III, p. 766, are merely a stopgap. The system must be re-done without the preconceptions I have noted here, using all the evidence available. My extensions only rebut claims such as, “Anc. Chin. final -iəu regularly goes back to Arch. -iôg*.”^a The reconstructions in these notes still owe more to Karlgren than Cikoski.

I also modify Karlgren’s Ancient Chinese, mostly tweaks to correct misread 反切, but one systemic change is the replacement of his initial /hʰz- with a voiced retroflex sibilant /z- homorganic with /ʃ-. While there may indeed be some Archaic h- that yield Ancient /z-, most words with this initial can be simply explained as unchanged from Archaic to Ancient: z- → /z-. The evidence for a nasal quality in /hʰz- seems to me to point to Wu and perhaps other dialects having little effect on those of Ch’angan and K’aifeng. (See above, p. xxxix.)

A major departure from GSR is recognition that the hypothesis of initial clusters is not needed to account for the development from Archaic to Ancient, so they ought to be left out of any model that adheres to the principle of paucity of entities. I propose a cluster-free model that is pleasingly simple. Of course when it is applied to texts it will turn out to have been oversimplified; for one thing, it still presents a unitary language without dialects, which is very improbable. But the project is still in an early stage and I am still erecting scaffolding. My proposal is based on a modified version of the proposal of George Kennedy^b for dealing with the asymmetry of Karlgren’s treatment of his initial g- in Archaic Chinese. I start with a stage—I can’t put a date on it within centuries yet—at which old Chinese had a uvular-velar contrast. There were three uvulars, unvoiced and voiced fricatives and an unvoiced stop (in IPA, [χ,ʁ,q]). There were five velars, voiced/unvoiced and aspirated/unaspirated plus a nasal (in IPA, [k,k^h,g,g^h,ŋ]). I am inclined to think syllable tone was at that time either not distinctive at all or at least not phonemically distinctive. I could put it that in phonemic terms there were seven velars (to be interpreted either in Karlgren’s mode or in Kennedy’s), since both in comparands and in phonetic series the uvulars remain in firm contact with the velars except for a few aberrations like the replacement of m- by χ-. But the contrast came into prominence when the increasing lenition of voiced unaspirated initials (perhaps leading to tone becoming phonemic) brought a velar into confusion with a uvular. A lenis velar g- might have been hard to distinguish from a uvular fricative [ʁ]. Speakers can do several things to mitigate the confusion that can arise if phonemically distinct sounds become phonetically similar. They can shift the point of articulation of one or both, they can modify the vocal quality of one or both (eg by nasalizing or denasalizing), or they can replace one or both with other sounds that are similar enough to leave the words that contain them recognizable but different enough to make the two sounds more readily distinguishable.

I suggest that third option as one thing that happened to Archaic g- on the way to Ancient Chinese. In acoustical terms, when for some speakers it approximated a guttural /r/ too close to the uvular fricative [ʁ], they replaced it, as speakers of many other languages do in varied circumstances, with an apical /r/, or rather with the closest thing their inventory of phones contained, the apical liquid initial l-. In articulatory terms, it is to be noted that some speakers make an apical /l/ with the rear of the tongue raised, as if coarticulating [l] and [ʁ]. For such speakers, a direct transition from a lenis g- to an apical l- might have been simple and obvious, perhaps even overlapping in their normal range of articulation.

Another shortcoming of alphabet-mediated models is that the human beings whose actual everyday speech is the medium of language development are not interchangeable. Some speakers cannot produce the entire range of phones in their language because of imperfect control over some of the muscles that shape the vocal tract. The lateral lisp, for example, is surprisingly widespread. Emotional openness or resistance to change also varies widely among individuals. Group solidarity can affect how sound change progresses in sub-dialects, and political change can then move such a group from a position of little influence to one of power, in which all aspects of their style of behavior including their pronunciation may be emulated by members of other groups. Saying that Archaic g- became Ancient l- summarizes untold human interactions over centuries. Such a formula is like articulating two bones of a fossil; however sure we may be that these two bones belong together, that gives us little information about the beast's behavior when it was alive.

Our present knowledge does not permit reconstructing clusters while we lack answers to the general question of who pronounced a word how, when, and in what context. To assume that, given clusters, there must be affixes is to ensure finding affixes regardless. Consider an infix -l- postulated on the evidence of pairs like siəg 司 “oversee” and sləg 史 “scribe.” Does the infix survive if you reconstruct siəd 司 “oversee” and l̥iəb 史 “scribe”? In the GSR system, evidence for final -g in 司 or 史 would be either a reading with final -k or -ng for one of the graphs in series 972 (司) or 975 (史), or else a regular development of Archaic -iəg to Ancient /-i, neither of which Karlgren has. And the evidence for the sl- cluster seems to be that Karlgren couldn't think of any other way to relate Archaic liəg to Ancient /s̥i:. An initial sl- would be the probable result of fusion of prefix 𠄎 with a word with initial l-, but I think it would have been realized in speech as simple s̥-. I am still actively searching for possible affixes in CC but I no longer feel justified in seeking them in initial clusters reconstructed from disparate initials in phonetic series.

Here is the disposition of GSR's initial clusters I now view as most plausible. Homorganic clusters like dl- and tl- are rejected on grounds of violation of paucity. (See above, p. xxxix.) Labial-apical clusters like ml- and bl- are rejected on grounds of weak evidence. (See above, pp. xl-xlii.) Of the velar-apical clusters, kl- is merged with k-, k'l- with k'- and ngl- with ng-. I keep gl- on the understanding that this digraph represents not a cluster but a simple obstruent subject to a sound change that can be written g→l but cannot yet be dated or localized. Clusters like ks- are merged with the corresponding velar even though the phonetic element is clearly used to write both K- and S- initials. (See note under 𠄎 diam below, p. 475 col I.) The uvular affricate χ- and stop ʔ- are left as they were. The rest will need painstaking work that will probably not be finished before I heave this edition out over the transom. Karlgren made such a mare's nest of his initials g-, g'- and /ɣ- that every word he gave one of them will have to be re-examined in the light of comparands. His initial l- words, also, will have to be vetted to see which were probably apicals throughout the period and which more likely came from earlier g-. (See below, p. lviii.)

Now consider some of the difficulties that have emerged in this process so far, and how the tools I am making might help attack them. First, consider a few problems that subsist mostly in the realm of grammar and syntax, perhaps not needing phonological information for their solution. Solutions to some of them have been proposed by sinologists; I find most such unsatisfactory.

Exceptions to standards of word-order

Within the structure of its phrases, word-order is rigid in CC. (See above, pp. vii-viii.) The flexibility that all languages require is provided by a sentence structure that lets nuclei and co-nuclei be coupled by mere juxtaposition with no prescribed order, allowing semantic relationships among them to be varied without needing to inflect any of their constituent words. There are also transformations that can be applied to a sentence by shifting a word out of its prescribed position in a syntactic phrase, typically leftward. In order to parse a CC sentence properly one needs a broad and clear understanding of how any word's class-membership interacts with its phrase-structural functions, and in this endeavor it is important to recognize that identical word-order does not imply identical phrase-structure, even though the converse implication does hold.

For example, appositives are distinguished from adjunct-head phrases only by the possibility of occurrence of the adjunct-marker 之 between adjunct and head acw the occurrence of a co-nuclear factor like 與 or 及 between appositives. Where the connecting word is not present there is no surface difference between the two types of phrase. Given a sequence of two nouns there is no mechanical way for a student to determine which of these two structures to assign it; that takes an advanced knowledge of the language, which is just what the student is trying to acquire. Given 王赧 “King Nan” do we find a parallel in 王子 “king's son” or 王公 “kings and dukes”? The only method I have found to give good results when applied to this type of problem is the use of comparands, and as always in the application of this method, the more comparands we find, the more confidence we can place in our conclusion.

Sinologists' intellectual laziness blurs the view through this window, as it does many others, by idly seizing on superficial resemblances to western ideas and customs instead of working to see Chinese on its own terms. Europeans refer to a monarch by his title and name, as King George. So 惠王 must be King Hui—what else could it be? And if 王赧 is King Nan then we need pay no attention to word-order and are free to “understand” CC by mashing up “character meanings” and indulging our imagination to make the text say whatever we please. No wonder sinology shows so strong a need for authority in its reading of texts; without it, what is still sometimes plausible would lapse into mere word salad.

I say factor always precedes object in CC phrases. Thus given 肉食 “eat meat” where I would expect 食肉, I have some explaining to do. Glad to oblige. First, this anomalous phrase structure is found only with a tiny minority of the CC vocabulary. “Chop trees” is 伐木; you will not see that expressed *木伐. “Throw stones” is 投石, not *石投. You will not see “dig ditches” expressed *渠鑿. Moreover, the anomalous phrase is not synonymous with the standard one. If a man ate meat only once in his life, we would say of that occasion 食肉 “he ate meat”. We would not say of it 肉食 “he ate a meat diet.” The first nucleus refers to distinct acts, the second to a habitual practice. This is true of all examples I have seen of this anomalous structure, eg 穀食 “eat a grain diet”, 布衣 “wear hemp-cloth”, 葛衣 “wear kudzu-cloth”, 儒服 “wear Confucian garb”, 巢居 “dwell in nests”. Also, for two of these verbs there is a noun related by what is often called tone-change derivation^a. A third, 居, also has a related noun “shelter” but so far as I know the noun is a homophone of the verb.

Having set out to define every word and analyse every sentence in the corpus, I am faced with the question of what function labels to apply to the components of this idiom. I see the necessity to dig into details of historical relation of CC to earlier languages to find how such a construction might have arisen. That is not a high priority on my list. If anyone else wants to tackle this problem, please go at it with my blessing. On a strictly synchronic level, it does not matter whether a locution like 穀食 evolved by re-analysis of an earlier object-factor structure. The question is how we fit it into a general synchronic model. What other structures do we classify with it that are less obviously parallel to it than 巢居? I have let myself be unconsciously misled by the irrelevant consideration that grain is syntactically an object in the English translations of both 食穀 and 穀食 even after seeing hundreds upon hundreds of examples of nouns in the function of factor and of verbs in the function of object in CC. Descriptions of animals, for example, abound in such locutions as 赤首鼠目, syntactically verb/factor + noun/object, noun/factor + noun/object. Semantically “has the eyes of a rat” is not miles away from “has a diet of grain;” the only obvious difference is that in these nuclei 鼠 is putative while 穀 is not. Noting that the way to say “does not make his diet of grain” is 不穀食, I now consider 肉食 and its cousins to be simply analyzable as factor-object. This may lead me to reconsider some uses of stative verbs that I had been calling nuclear adjuncts.

Loose ends in the word-class system

The CC word-class conundrum was cracked in 1968, but many of its details remain unilluminated. One aspect of the CC word-class system that has gone almost entirely unexamined is the diachronic. An example of the kind of thing that can be observed only over time is that as Chinese developed through post-Han into T'ang, more and more one can observe neutral verbs in absolute use treated as if they were ergative. Clearly the system that flourished ca. 300 BC evolved into a different system. This is in no wise remarkable since all languages change all the time, but a careful reader needs to know in detail how the 左傳 word-class system differs from that of Shih Chi 史記, and it in turn from that of Pao-p'u-tzū 抱朴子. One way in which such changes can arise is by the derivation of new words from old on the analogy of yet other words. The word play in English, for instance, has spun off so many clones, some neutral some ergative, that hearing They're playing Jones one cannot tell without context whether Jones is a game, a strategy, a team, a player, a song, a dramatis persona or the victim of a fraud. Even with the neutral-ergative distinction still operative, what looks like the same word might be ergative in one dialect, neutral in another. Such things show us that we need careful attention to detail in comparing words from one text to another, and when we do that we find that, as detailed scrutiny typically reveals, things are more complicated than they had first appeared.

Some ergative verbs in Kuo Yü 國語 seems to be intransitive or transitive in 左傳, e.g. 弑 šīəg “assassinate.” Maybe 左傳 just happens not to display the full paradigm. But some seem to be neutral in 左傳, e.g. 入 niəp “enter”; 聘 p'ǐəng “ask for wife”; 殺 sat “kill”; 舉 kio

^a Gordon Downer, “Derivation by Tone Change in Classical Chinese,” BSOAS 22 (1959), pp. 258-90.

“select”. 呂氏春秋 and 淮南子 have 得 tək “get” as ergative. We have multiple readings for 化 to apply to 呂氏春秋: 往教者不化 召師者不化 “A teacher who goes to his student does not instruct; a student who summons his teacher is not instructed,” where one word is clearly ergative and the other neutral. Cf the next sentence, 自卑者不聽 卑師者不聽 “One who humbles himself gets no deference; one who humbles his teacher gives no deference.” GSR 835d’ gives 聽 two readings. As well as niəp, 入 is read nəp, and 殺 has -d readings. This may be fruitful ground for research on the -t | -d, -k | -g “tone-derivation” phenomenon.^a

Some seeming exceptions to the rule that no verb is both neutral and ergative can be sorted out by semantic criteria, e.g. 居 kio “occupy” is neutral and has as object a word for a place, while 居 kio “give | take shelter” is ergative and has as object a word for a person. Comparands, though not needed to make such a determination, can illuminate the distinction by showing how such homophones could stem from distinct sources. “Occupy” fits well with set 48 “grip tight” while “shelter” fits with set 54 “emplace”. In the process of verifying that, we might also notice that a third verb written 居, namely kio “sit”, fits less well with either of the first two than with set 57 “bend”. The words that show up ergative in late CC may have something in common semantically: 得, 取, 舉 come to mind. In Ode 78, 火烈具舉, 舉 seems to be ergative, parallel with 揚 in 火烈具揚. Maybe “rise, raise” is ergative, “choose, select” neutral?

Morphological reduplication

What we call morphological reduplication in Mandarin is chiefly three phenomena:

A. reduplicating nouns to mean “all, each”: 人人都有 “Everyone has it.”

B. reduplicating verbs to mean “have a go at it”: 看看吧 “Why don’t you take a look?” (It may be worth noting that it is possible to insert yi 一 between the two occurrences of the verb, 看一看 “look one look,” as if the second were the object of the first as factor.)

C. reduplicating adverbial statives to intensify them: 好好的 “thoroughly, very well.”

In my non-native Mandarin, A can only be done to monosyllables while B works also with polysyllables, and C may be accompanied by a tone change on the second iteration.

To a sinologist for whom a character is a packet of meaning and whose only training in grammar has been in the grammar of Mandarin there is no problem: repeating a character gives more of the same meaning, just as two pounds of fertilizer is more than one pound. To a linguist for whom a graph writes a syllable of an utterance which has an internal structure, there are three problems of language development: these three patterns are either rare or, arguably, nonexistent until Han. (George Kennedy made that observation in the form I call Kennedy’s law: $X-X \neq 2X$.) What might be precursors of the three emerge in late Chankuo and continue through Han, though still rare.

There are examples of the very same sequence of graphs 人人 in Mencius that superficially resemble type A. When Mencius says 人人親其親長其長 “Treat people as people. Treat their parents as parents, their elders as elders,” he is not claiming that the world will only be at peace when every last man behaves properly; he is saying that officials need to treat subjects as people rather than cattle in order to minimize rebelliousness. Mencius is no populist, but a patronizing elitist who sees that if subjects are condescended to in accordance with the same relative rankings of deference and precedence they use among themselves, not only is their resentment at being ruled somewhat placated, their own observance of these rankings is reinforced by the example, which in turn strengthens the dominance of the rulers. This occurrence of 人人 is a nuclear sentence with the structure of factor + object, parallel with the structure of the two sentences that follow it.

A second occurrence is a bit more complicated and has analogs worth discussing. When Mencius says 焉得人人而濟之 “Where did he get that taking them across one by one?” the context makes it clear that Mencius does not mean everyone in the state of Chêng; he means some people, whose number is indeterminate, of whom the noteworthy thing is that they are dealt with one by one, as individuals. Unlike the preceding example, in which the erroneous analysis of 人人 takes it to be the subject of the sentence as in the Mandarin of example A, here 人人 could not be the subject. Its semantic relation to 濟之 is that of an adverb of manner, which is no help to analysis of its structure but does give a clue of where to look for possibly enlightening similar examples.

Consider 與子人事一人焉 “Let you and me each of us serve one of them,” and 予之人百金 “He gave them each man a hundred ducats,” in 韓非子. Here 人 as adjunct is paired with a number in what follows. This is analogous to a similar locution with 日. Examples: 論語 has 吾日三省吾身 “Each day I thrice critique myself.” 淮南子 has 日日行一度而歲有奇四分度之一 “The sun moves one degree each day and each year it has one-fourth of a degree left over.” The usage of 歲 in the second example is the same, as shown by 歲行三十度十六分度之七 “Each year [Jupiter] moves $30\frac{7}{16}$ degrees.” We also find 日日 parallel to 人人, as in 荀子’s 日日相親愛 “Day by day they grow more solicitous of each other.” And 歲歲 as in 論衡’s 皇天歲歲怒 “August Heaven is angered year after year.” This may be simple reduplication; I cannot convincingly refute that idea yet, though I prefer to think of it as syntactically identical to my first example of 人人 (ie “take each person as a person”, “make each day a day”) and thus syntactically unrelated to the non-reduplicated form. But whatever we call it, it is a productive mechanism, whose products are co-nuclear phrases, not subjects. The entire corpus has but three or four exceptions to that, which are simply explained as scribal corruptions of 人各.

Now take a brief look into the future. Writing some six centuries after Mencius, Ko Hung 葛洪 says 仲尼荅之人人異辭 “When Confucius replied to them, he used different words to each man,” which resembles the usage of Mencius rather than the modern usage in that 人人異辭 could be paraphrased as 人人而異辭. His is a mannered literary style, modeled on classical usage (though he does use a few distinctive post-classicisms such as 不爲之) and full of parallel structures and ultra-concise allusions, but I am sure it would have been intelligible if read aloud to an educated contemporary. Whether 人人 would have meant “man by man” in his contemporary vernacular or, on the contrary, training in the classical language would have been needed to teach one to interpret 人人 as “man by man” rather than “everyone,” is a question for which data are lacking. Some five centuries after that Po Chü-yi 白居易, who is known to have made an effort to write his poems in a style very near his contemporary vernacular, begins a poem with the line 人人避暑走如狂 “Everyone runs about like mad, trying to escape the heat.” I see no grounds to distinguish that from the modern usage.

There are cases in which blind application of the two principles of sinology mentioned above (Graphs Have Meanings and There Is No Grammar) show what appears to be early examples of reduplication paralleling B above. And since the surface is where all sinology is conducted, no further inquiry ensues. A fine example is in Ode 8, where 采采 appears to be echoed by 采之 in the very next line. One would think that the occurrence of 蒹葭采采 in Ode 129 and 采采衣服 in Ode 150 would prompt a re-thinking of what had appeared to be obvious, but that is not how sinology works: the character 采 has two Meanings and the translator, if sufficiently senior, is privileged to choose between them (if not, the teacher's choice must be accepted). The character 采 Means both “pluck” and “color” and if “pluck-pluck” doesn't work in Ode 150, “color-color” is sent in as substitute and play goes on as before. (I take 采采 as an onomatope ts'ab-ts'ab in all three cases.)

A possible precursor of the seeming reduplication of stative verbs as in C above is seen in examples like 蒼蒼 “cerulean” and 章章 “blatant.” Ode 304 has a good example: 如火烈烈 “Blazing like fire”. I say “seeming reduplication” because, although 蒼 and 章 and 烈 are perfectly good monosyllables, they lack the frequency of occurrence of words like 日 and 人. I would feel more confident in calling this a productive mechanism if I saw it done to words like 大 or 善 or 多 instead of what I do see, 甚大 and 甚善 and 甚多. I see no indisputable examples with such common words before the Han era, when we find a few such locutions as 其小小者, “the very tiniest of them,” in the Shang Lin Fu 上林賦. Even here there is no certainty; note that 其小小 could be a copyist's corruption of 甚小. The earliest convincing example I have found so far is in the Lun Hêng 論衡 of 王充 (late 1st C. AD), in which he uses both 青 and 青青 with the space of a paragraph to refer to the green color of flourishing plants, and where 青青 is rhetorically parallel to 泉泉 referring to lively noises made by active creatures, so that it is unlikely to be a copyist's inaccuracy.

It may be that this idiom is merely a semantic specialization of the regular construction factor + object, in which 蒼蒼 would be translated “make blue bluer.” An example of this is 高高下下 “make the high higher and the low lower,” in 國語. And note that here, as everywhere, we need to read the sound of the syllable and refuse to be led astray by the “meaning of the character”. For example, in Ode 225 Karlgren renders 狐裘黃黃 as “their fox furs are very yellow.” It is well to bear in mind that 黃 means “brown” more often than “yellow,”^a but either way that seems far-fetched; those fox-fur cloaks were made of the throat and belly fur and were pure white.^b I suggest this binome might more regularly—according to modern orthography—have been written 煌煌.

Any prosodic difference between 蒼蒼 “cerulean” and 蒼蒼 “make blue bluer” may by now be lost beyond recovery. A few clues might be found in examples of partial reduplication that resemble the tone-shift often seen in C above, e.g. the existence of both 幾 kīər and 幾希 kīərxiər “minute,” or 虛 χio “without result” and 虛居 χiochio “uncaused.”

For an explanation broad enough to cover all cases instead of a few selected ones, the problem to solve may be not how reduplicatives are formed from monosyllables but how attributive disyllables work when reduced to monosyllables. As Kennedy pointed out^c translations are not to be relied on with regard to these expressions: doubled graphs tend to be uncommon ones, common graphs are rarely found doubled, and the attempt to apply the sinologists' traditional formula $x-x = 2x$ typically founders in futility; the translators are then reduced to guessing the meaning from the context, a game at which the student can play as well as the expert. As far back as we can trace the writing of Chinese we find repeated graphs, but they are not a unitary phenomenon. They must be analysed case by case.

A reply to my objection about 大, 善 and 多 might start from observing that onomatopes seem to fit the pattern of 蒼 and 蒼蒼. In e.g. Ode 165 the nucleus 嚶其鳴矣 looks like 嚶 as ^a E.g. in Ode 78 Karlgren's “yellow horses” really would be better rendered “brown horses.”

^c George A. Kennedy, “A Note on Ode 220,” in Separatum: Studia Serica Bernhard Karlgren Dedicata, Stockholm 1959, pp 190-8 factor and 其鳴 as object; the same ode has 鳥鳴嚶嚶, allowing the inference that onomatopoes for bird and animal cries are lexically stative verbs. But how do 蒼, 章 and 烈 differ from 大, 善 and 多?

In my investigation of the modal 其 thirty years ago, I considered 其 X of the sort we see with half of a reduplicated binome as being modal; but in some texts the analogous word is 厥, which is evidence that it is adjunct, not modal, assuming those occurrences are not spurious concoctions. Pairs like Ode 167 雨雪霏霏 and Ode 41 雨雪其霏 lead me to wonder if there is another word written 其, one that has not yet been isolated. In Ode 41 the adjacent line is 北風其喈 in which the parallel word to 霏, 喈, seems to be another of the onomatopoes just mentioned, as witness Ode 168 倉庚喈喈, parallel to 鳥鳴嚶嚶 just cited. That allows the inference that 霏 is a stative verb.

The reason 蒼, 章 and 烈 but not 大, 善 or 多 are reduplicated might not be the difference in frequency of occurrence; CC does reduplicate a common stative verb, 一 iet “be | make one”. I analyze 一一 as factor-object, just as I do 蒼蒼. Now 一 differs from 大, 善 and 多 in that, in the acceptance of 一 with the counting-number sense of “lone; isolated”, which is what it surely has in 一一, one cannot say *甚一; that may be enough to tip the balance of permitting or prohibiting reduplication; my sprachgefühl says *甚嚶 is an unlikely locution. Reduplication might only apply to stative verbs denoting qualities not measurable on a scale named by a pair of opposites, as 大小, 善惡 or 多少; I find no paired opposite of 蒼, 章, 烈 or 一.

Separability of binomes

A long-running controversy concerns analysis and interpretation of binomes that are not reduplicative. (I have already discussed and dismissed the accordion-pleating of monosyllables with disyllables; see above, pp. xliii-xlvi.) Some are nouns and some verbs. Some mimetics look like onomatopoes but others do not. The dispute has mostly been conducted on the barren ground of the ancient factional quarrel between The Knowledge Of The Ancients and Plain Old Common Sense. Neither faction goes as far as the first step of the scientific method: taking a careful look at the data in as large quantities as can be managed.

Unanalysable does not mean indivisible. In some contexts—eg as objects of the same factor repeated—we find the parts of non-reduplicative binomes, e.g. 鳳皇 etc, split up but we needn't take that as evidence that the halves have separate existence so long as that's the only way we find them divided, i.e. so long as one is not contrasted with the other. No one doubts that tomahawk is monomorphemic because Samuel Johnson called one a “tom-axe.” The occurrence of “Cali-bloody-fornia” doesn't make California a synonym-compound.

Another form of splitting that does not lead to analysis is that disyllabic mimetics can be reduplicated in a way reminiscent of MC, eg in Ode 47 委托 becomes 委委托托, and in 呂覽大樂, 渾沌 becomes 渾渾沌沌. This may be what we see in Ode 200 with 緝緝翩翩 and 捷捷幡幡, and in Ode 209 with 濟濟蹢蹢. This pattern is seen also in 子子孫孫, not a reduplication of 子 followed by one of 孫 but rather a reduplication of the disyllable 子孫.

In disyllables in texts I find synonym-compounds to be exceedingly rare, but so are words with a high probability of being unanalysable disyllabic stem-words. All need to be tested case by case. Disyllabic comparands are illuminating. For example, set 450 languid (below, vol. II p. 236) and set 514 swirl (below, vol. II p. 239) show, I believe, development of a disyllabic monomorphemic mimetic from an earlier two-word phrase that is analyzable syntactically. Both, if my guess is right, show the sort of development seen in English forms like itsy-bitsy. This is a baby-talk variant of itty-bitty, itself a baby-talk form of little- bitty. The underlying form is the three-word phrase little bit of, realized in fluent speech as [lɪtəbɪtə]. It is a quantitative that is used with mass nouns, exactly parallel to small glass of and tiny cup of. Frequently-used multi-word forms, it appears, can be stored in the brain as unitary forms that are produced by speakers in the same manner as single words, and are susceptible to being fused into single words. If that happened to little bit of, the quantitative meaning of bit, vague as it already was, may have been lost utterly, with the result that the syntactic restriction of little bit of to mass nouns might not have been felt by all speakers in all contexts. Then the widespread confusion between /ə/ and /i/ as open final syllables in English could give [lɪtəbɪti] as a variant of [lɪtəbɪtə] for little bit of, allowing reanalysis of the /i/ of [lɪtəbɪti] as the /i/ of sandy, windy and so forth, freeing [lɪtəbɪti] for use with count nouns as a polysyllabic but monomorphemic adjective meaning “very small.” I suggest some such process produced the monomorphemic mimetics in set 450 from an underlying two-word resultative compound consisting of a first word meaning “bend” (ie a member of set 57) and a second word meaning “fall down” (ie a member of set 268). For set 514 I propose a factor-object phrase, the factor meaning “to wave” (ie a member of set 142) and the object meaning “trailing sash” (ie a member of set 268). Further analysis must await sorting-out of examples to be found in texts. (See appendix IV, pp. 767-8.)

Words for “tadpole” seem to illustrate resyllabification. A common word is a binome 蝌蚪 k'wātu (my k'wärtug), a compound formed from a first word meaning “blob” (a member of set 329 lump) and a second one meaning “head” (a member of set 262 swell). The initial stop of the second syllable seems to have been geminated in 活東 g'wâtung, a form given in 爾雅. A resyllabified form may have lost its final vowel in 蜎 k'wât.

Problems discussed in the foregoing sections may be solvable without reference to phonology, but that should not be assumed a priori. Phenomena like those reported in Kennedy’s “Two Tone-patterns in Tangsic”^a should be constantly in mind, despite the slim odds of finding evidence of their presence or absence in this corpus. A careful study of loan graphs in their syntactic context might shed some light, as might any examples of resyllabification that turn up. In particular, in word-class shift or reduplication such phenomena may have played a role, and they cannot be ruled out in the contrast of factor + object with adjunct + head.

Voiced labials

How the final obstruents are distributed among words in GSR partly depends on the meaning we attach to “word” and “in GSR.” Making these two assumptions:

- “in GSR” means written with a graph listed in GSR
- “word” means a monosyllable, including reduplicatives but not including Karlgren’s split binomes, defined as a word in my database (even if the definition is not among those in GSR)

I find a total of 7745 graphs writing 11,244 words of which 9735 have one of the ten final obstruents -p, -t, -k, -m, -n, -ng, -b, -d, -g, -r. They are distributed thus:

-p 299	-t 666	-k 1229
-m 574	-n 1831	-ng 1632
-b 18	-d 522	-g 2168
	-r 796

^a Language 29 No. 3, 1953, pp. 367-373

Nothing about language requires symmetrical distribution of its elements, but there is a strong tendency for languages to make efficient use of available resources. It would be surprising to find a language with, say, four hundred homonyms pronounced bop, and only one each of bip, bep and bap—surprising but not impossible. If this table had come from transcribed data there would be no point in saying it has too few -b and too many -g. One might hazard explanations for the skewed distribution, but to object to the distribution as such would be silly. But this table contains no data. It contains only the artifacts of conjecture. That such conjectures include “Anc. Chin. final -iəu regularly goes back to Arch. -iôg*”^a suggests that the frequency of -g might be lower if a different set of assumptions had motivated the reconstruction. Applying the methods I described above (pp. xxxii-xxxiv), for the same set of 11,244 words the table becomes:

-m 580	-n 1830	-ng 1629
-b 498	-d 567	-g 2240
	-r 1104

I made no attempt to correct an imbalance of too few -b and too many -g. The number of -b words has increased but so has the number of -g words. There are also more words in -r than in Karlgren’s version. These increases have come at the expense of Karlgren’s open syllables. It should be particularly noted that these figures are in no sense final. This table still includes much of the skewing effect of Karlgren’s theoretical bias toward final -g, which may be eased by identifying more and more comparands. That process has only begun; as it runs, questions like the following should be kept in mind.

Can we account for the seeming tendency for labial and apical finals (with the notable exception of -n) to be replaced over the long term by velars without postulating some supra-personal linguistic entity with an entelechy of its own? And could such an account also deal with the loss of non-nasal voiced stops?

Is the alternation of final -t and -p analogous to the relation between -d and -b? Or do we have suffix -t + -p → -pt → -t? There is a tradition that 葛 can be read with a final -p, and there does seem to be some contact between 葛 and 蓋, eg in the name 葛天~蓋天. Series 695 (內) is a puzzle to which Karlgren’s solution of -b evolving to -d is only one possibility. If, as seems more and more plausible, we ought to reconstruct 入 as ziəp instead of niəp it may be that 入 in 內 is not phonetic but signfic, that 入 is related to 插 ts’əp and not to 內, and there never was any -b in words for “interior”.

Do any of these alternations involve co-occurrence restrictions such as are attested in some modern dialects? Words represented by graphs with the phonetics 葉世替施曳失 seem to alternate -p | -t; do their initials have anything to do with this?

Is there a -b | -d dialect split, ie early -b → -d in some dialects? Doublets written with phonetics 爪少 | 又差 are interesting in this regard, although 少 itself looks good for -g on account of the -k in 削. Are -b and -g in the same relation as -m and -ng? What is that relation? Both -m and -ng occur in the same series eg 893 (莽). Archaic -m parallels Ancient -ng in words like 風. Some word-pairs with -m and -ng may be related, e.g. 替 ts’əm | 曾 dz’əng, 甚 điəm | 盛 điəng, 參 siəm | 升 siəng, 臨 liəm | 陵 liəng, 黔 ts’əm | 蒼 ts’əng. There are alternate words for the same thing with contrasting -m and -ng as eg words for the bird Upupa epops. Its common name is 戴勝 təgsiəng, but it is also called 戴鶯 təgniam and 戴南 təgnəm. And there is the musical instrument 空侯 k'ungg'u also called 坎侯 k'amg'u. What grounds have we for calling any of this diachronic sound change rather than synchronic dialect difference? Note also that 司馬遷 uses 同 d'ung instead of 談 d'âm to avoid a name-taboo. Perhaps he and his contemporaries felt a connection between -m and -ng. Do m- and ng- relate as initials?

We are told 却 is a “vulgar” form of 卻 for k'iak “push away, keep off,” but what if 却 is the earlier form? (The evidence of 說文 might have been valuable on points like this if it were anything but a ragbag of shallow ignorant arbitrary opinions.) Could there be doublets with contrasting -p and -k, leading us to discover some with contrasting -b and -g? If so, there may be words for which we cannot choose between -b and -g without first demarcating areas and eras respecting this distinction. Scribal casualness about the phonetic elements 叟婁曼爰 has created a confusion which seems to imply that uncertainty.

Or was there a shift of -b → -g as well as or instead of -b → -d? With words meaning “loud roar or rumble” we have all three types of paired final, -p | -k, -b | -d and -m | -ng. Onomatopoes are weak evidence for this sort of thing, but better examples may exist.

An alphabet-mediated model may suggest the assumption that the same letter undergoes the same change regardless of context. But, because of differences in both acoustic and articulatory environments across syllable boundaries, we may not take for granted that initial obstruents change in the same way or at the same rate as final obstruents. The study of comparands has suggested many words as probably having had final -b (see above, pp. xl-xlii). No such success has attended a search for possible initial b-. Karlgren reconstructed a lone example of the simple initial b-, 聿, and marked it as questionable. In these notes I add five, only one of those with real confidence, 婁 biwər. This reading has support both from a comparand, an alternate reading b'iwər of the same proper name written 婁, and from a common phonetic element used to write p-, p'- and b'- initials and only those. (Three others have 聿 as phonetic, and the fourth, 梘, is from a small series not even in GSR, that has one member with a k- initial, and a motley array of finals.) It could turn out that b- was the first of the voiced unaspirated initials to lenite itself out of existence, and that the six words written with these five graphs are all that remained at whatever stage GSR is supposed to be.

Still, the contrast between that pathetic remnant of six words and the vast array of words given an initial g- by GSR suggests that a vigorous search might turn up other initial b- words, the more so since all those g- words were generated by Karlgren's backward-cranking regular development mill (see above, p. xxxiii). That mill would have generated Archaic Chinese giwər for 婁 from the Ancient Chinese /jwɛi given in 廣韻 by the 反切 雨非. But the comparand and the phonetic element make that improbable. Perhaps a close look at other words with /j- initial and labial glide in Ancient Chinese will turn up more words with possible Archaic b- initial. One word that looks promising in that regard is 雲 /jiuən “cloud”, if given comparands like 饋 piwən “steam” in the huge set 142. More examples are 曰 /jiwət “say” with 發 piwät “emit”, and 鉞 /jiwnt “ax” with 伐 b'iwät “to chop”. Ambiguity about /b/ and /g/ may include b- and g- initials as well as -b and -g finals. Nor should we ignore the Archaic d- initials the mill churns out from Ancient /i-. Compare 淫 /iəm “to exceed limit” with 汎 b'iüm (my b'iəm) “to spread out”.

Tonogenesis

All languages utilize—in some way or other—the phonetic phenomena that make syllable-tones. Modern Chinese languages vary greatly in how lexical tones of individual syllables are realized in speech. Perhaps we should ask not when and how Chinese syllables acquired tones but when and how syllable tones became an important part of rime schemes.

The terminus ad quem is AD 601, when 切韻 rimed syllables in four phonetic categories, three pitch-tones plus -płk.^a Captions attributed to Kuo P'u 郭璞 (AD 276 - 324) in Shan Hai Ching 山海經, use a rime scheme very similar to that in 切韻. Noting the voluminous Han rimes that give a strong impression of lexicalized tone, I do not see the Odes as a terminus a quo. Despite its heterogeneous origins and its mucked-about textual history, statistics got by assigning 切韻 tone to each of 4845 tokens in riming position in the Odes, ignoring the certainty of sound change and dialect difference, show that rimes in the Odes have a closer resemblance to the tone system of 切韻 than what can be ascribed to chance. This table shows how many of the total of 1650 sets of riming words contain a word in each pitch-tone and how many of those contain no word of any other tone:

1	866	665
3	358	248

Given the parlous state of transmission of both Odes and 切韻, there is no point in basing precise calculations on these numbers. We can be sure that if tone played no role in rime, the odds of a distribution anything like this are slim.

My scientific wild guesses, absent the massive research that remains to be done:

- The lexicalization of syllable-tone was essentially complete over much of North China by 700 BC (and maybe centuries earlier).
- That process was related to the loss of non-nasal unaspirated voiced obstruents, which was also well advanced by that time.
- Different dialects likely had different tone systems, not all of which can necessarily be reconstructed from surviving evidence.
- No suppositious affixes need to be postulated solely to account for the phonetics of this process. (However, if affixes are postulated on the evidence of etymology, their possible role in the process must be considered.)

No use waiting for sinology to get better

If you have read this far you probably are not a sinologist but you may want to take CC texts into account in your own research, in history or sociology or literature or any of a hundred fields. If so, I see three realistic options for you: learn to read them in their own language for yourself, accept what sinologists tell you about them, or fake it.

Don't dismiss that third option without thought. The heyday of Pound, Ayscough & Co. was a century ago, but that does not mean it is no longer possible to build an awesome career out of stone fakery. Avoid making claims that might call for fact-checking; never take positions vulnerable to objections that would be hard to finesse with trendy buzzwords. Keep a high-minded tone, be unfailingly obsequious to your seniors, recycle perennial middlebrow memes, concentrate your most detailed work on the most nebulous, insubstantial part of your thesis, footnote anything and everything, and Bob's your uncle.

^a The Szū Shêng P'u 四聲譜 of Shên Yüeh 沈約 is said to have done that nearly a century earlier, but it has not survived.

If you care enough about the value of your work for its own sake to reject the third option, then to take the second option is to walk on quicksand. The objections to sinology I noted above show that what sinologists call scholarship is shoddy stuff. Their rule is simple: Never ask if things are genuinely done in sinology as they are in other intellectual endeavors. Instead, imitate surface forms and blandly assert that generally accepted standards are being met, relying on the refractoriness of your primary sources to stymie outsiders' inquiries into how you utilize them.

There have been honest sinologists, importing the rigor of other disciplines they practised, as anthropology for Owen Lattimore, with scant transference of it to the field of sinology, or, like George Kennedy, voicing blunt native candor to even less effect. But to me, all that distinguishes an eminence like Peter Boodberg from a scapegrace like Edmund Backhouse is that Boodberg kept to middle-class standards in daily life, I believe, while Backhouse was louche. Backhouse's ethical laxity extended to money; Boodberg confined his to matters of the intellect. Did Boodberg believe in the objective validity of his cedules? Well, did Backhouse believe in the existence of the notional Krupp guns he tried to sell?

You might wonder if learning to recognize a few thousand characters could give you a means of cross-checking sinologists' conventional wisdom by comparing what they say with what the texts say. That is unlikely at best. If you learn characters you have no choice but to learn their conventional meanings—unless you choose to invent your own character meanings, which would not, I assure you, be an improvement on the status quo. Unless and until you learn CC as a proper language you can only accept what you are told by sinologists, if not directly then at two or three removes.

If you are reluctant to utilize linguistics

I am no longer willing to concede any legitimacy to a sinologist's rejection of linguistics. Does a good gardener reject botany? Does a doctor reject physiology? Does a student of Shakespeare object to being informed that in Who keeps the gate here, ho! this Who is the relative pronoun, not the interrogative? A focusing incident in my brief and pointless career as a sinologist came in a workshop on Chinese philosophy at Harvard in the summer of 1976. A doyen of sinology looked me right in the eye and rejected all my work with one curt phrase: "You linguists and your 'izations!'" At that time one of his favored students was actively peddling the meme that CC isn't a language, but I think I saw more than mere protectiveness in his resentful glare. I wonder if he dimly foresaw that I would take the position I now hold, that sinology done without linguistic science is intellectually dishonest. And by linguistic science I do not mean the superficial use of the terminology of linguistics.

If you ever deal with poetry, you will have to come to terms with mimetic binomes. Everyone who has translated fu or tz'ü or sao has struggled with their semantic unyieldingness, and they are not unknown in shih nor yet in prose. You cannot rely on commentaries to bail you out; nothing less than a genuine command of the Classical Chinese language will save you from grotesqueries like the one I cited above (p. xxix) in which David Hawkes misread a description of a statesman forced to assume the demeanor of an obedient son to a queen and turned him instead into a perfumed fop snickering to hide his embarrassment at Nell Gwynne's catty asides about her royal stud. I believe CC mimetics can be sorted out as words, and the tool of choice is the study of comparands (see above, p. xliii, and the appendix Mimetics and comparands, pp. 767-8). Comparands have many more uses as well. Investigating traditional crafts may be helped by identifying the origins of some of their technical terms. Comparands can shed light there, as they can in the history of Chinese medicine, biology, music and other ill-understood subjects. But working with comparands in sinological Pekinese is like juggling handfuls of dust.

For a study of any historical phenomenon, you will have to read hundreds of thousands or millions of words if you are not to run a grave risk of missing important information. In English you could read that much in weeks. Reading CC in faux-Peking pronunciation as characters rather than as language it might take you a bit longer. If you master CC as a language you can read it with little more trouble than Mandarin. What I have seen of the reading of CC by sinologists' methods does not impress me as anything approaching mastery.

My emphasis on reading in reconstructed pronunciation may seem like asking students to take up saws and hammers and build their own library carrels before reading any books. Well, if carrels are needed someone must build them. We can't read books that are still on shelves; we can only pretend to read them by clairvoyance. Still, as good researchers are not necessarily good carpenters, so philology done by specialists in other fields has dubious value. Recreating sounds of old Chinese is going to take a long time; I may well not live to see its outcome. And in the meanwhile, there are CC texts you want to read now, and you wonder why I tantalize you by claiming you could read much better when there isn't anything you can do about it except continue to plod along in the traditional way. But there is.

You can help build e-texts with hyperlinks. Imagine yourself reading a book while at a computer. On the screen is the same text as in the book. You come to a word you don't know, do some form of mouse-clickery and your screen shows all occurrences of that word in your text. Or all occurrences in all texts of that period. Or an array of definitions for that word. Or a list of comparands for that word. Or examples of how that word has been translated into Pǔtōng Huà, Nihongo, Français, Deutsch, English.... You could hear comparands in a synthesized voice. You could view examples of the graphs in writing of the period of your text. It is now a tedious task to look up a word in that fashion, and the next reader of that text has to do it all over again. With hyperlinked e-texts you could get on with learning what really interests you instead of playing junior sinologist for thousands of hours of the most productive years of your life.

What would that require? A new 16-bit font, containing all and only the graphs that we need to read and study CC. The Unicode font is entirely inadequate for our purpose, while the admirable Konjaku Mojikyo fonts are overkill. With all the graphs in one font, books could be scanned into text files by OCR, and each search for a graph would yield only that graph. I give a tentative list of graphs for such a font in volume II, table 5, pp. 93-III.

Then the slow job of scanning books needs to be done even for those of which e-texts already exist. Secondary sources would also have to be scanned. (I don't know the legal status of fair use by scholars under such conditions. It might turn out that only works in the public domain could be put to such use.) And the software would have to be written. It would help to have an introductory textbook of the amo-amas-amat, gāo-máng-hǎo-lèi variety. An interactive HTML textbook could be made self-paced, and could be garnished with hyperlinked sidebars on any relevant topic.

If you are are willing to utilize linguistics

Don't put implicit reliance in basic principles of linguistics; these do not have the solidity of their seeming analogs in the physical sciences. A good example is the phonemic principle, which is about as well-grounded a theoretical generalization as one can find in this field. It is a special case of the psychological principle of categorical perception; its pervasiveness makes possible the use of alphabets. To the kind of mind that seeks simplicity and regularity it can seem to be a diamond edge that will smooth any material. Non-linguists who wander into historical phonology seize it like an adze to hack data into smooth symmetric shape. The salient fact that mutually intelligible dialects can have differing inventories, and even different numbers, of phonemes gives them no sense of the artificiality of any scheme that claims to phonemicize an entire language. Even a particular idiolect might not follow a consistent phonemic system throughout its existence; for example, someone born and raised in one milieu and educated in another might address the later group in an “educated” accent, the earlier in an “uneducated” one, and the two could be mutually intelligible while having incommensurate phonemic systems. The mind quails at the prospect of phonemicizing a corpus consisting of the dialect jokes of a clever mimic. Other empirical principles should be treated with equal caution. Any of them might turn out to be a suitable tool to apply to your given material, but you must be sceptical, the more so if you get promising results at first.

The principles on which you should rely are instead the basic ones used to test intellectual validity. One worth especial stress in this context is Ockham’s razor, that entities are not to be multiplied beyond necessity. The need to stick to this principle in the historical study of the Chinese language cannot be overemphasized. The temptations to ignore it are innumerable and for some, perhaps, insuperable. The result has been a dismaying quantity of imaginative invention presented in the guise of scientific discovery.

For academics, the need to claim to know something is powerful. Those scrubbed faces staring expectantly from classroom seats, those senior visages peering dourly from committee-rooms, demand a display of knowledge, and if the knowledge is not there, a convincing front is required. Above the mundane motive is the artistic one: making up stories is fun. And when one may coin fantastic words like hjckrrrh or btfsplk the lure can be irresistible. What tenure-referee could withstand such Connecticut-yankee conjurations? The result is even more impressive if tricked out in typographic costume; not mere btfsplk but ^ʰtf_[pl:k]. How exotic it all looks, redolent of Tibetan mysticism and Burmese hill-tribe magic! And yet how scientific, like Einstein’s lunch napkin! Resist the temptation to dress up opinions and present them as facts, especially to yourself.

Once move beyond conjecture, beyond saying things like if there were a glottal-stop affix it would explain certain later developments, once allow yourself to suppose that the occurrence of your later developments proves the existence of your conjectural affix, and you have opened the door to writing fiction in the name of phonology. Then nothing but personal taste determines whether you invent a few simple sounds to which you ascribe vast combinatory power, or instead range boldly into exotica like nasal implosives, pharyngeal trills and eustachian clicks. When I see speculation on whether the tip or the flat of the tongue touched the teeth or the gum of an unknown speaker of an unrecorded language four thousand years ago, I wonder where the tip of the theorist’s own tongue is.

Don’t put uncritical trust in the exact wording of any text. There was a burning of books in Ch’in,^a and the imperial library burned at the end of that dynasty. Texts recovered later were redacted and consolidated to standards we would now consider inappropriate. Some were reconstructed from memory. Some were blatantly faked, others more subtly so. Passages were interpolated from fragments that may not have originated with that text; marginalia were incorporated into texts; strips were assembled out of order. The imperial library was burned again at the end of the Han dynasty. After that, surviving texts were copied and re-copied and the standard of accuracy was variable, to put it politely. (Remember, even if we could have an author's original copy, we could not be guaranteed that it contained no errors.) Always look for more examples of anything you are interested in.

^a Needham’s disbelief of this well-attested historical event is on no firmer grounds than that similar accusations have been made against other great men, which is no evidence at all. My personal reaction is to wonder if the burning of books and burying of scholars might have reminded him too uncomfortably of Stalin’s purges, which he also disbelieved.

Don't be misled by the erudition of traditional Chinese scholars into the assumption that they are infallible. None is superhuman, and some are quite unreliable. Glosses and commentaries are not primary evidence; they are opinions expressed by your elder colleagues.

Don't get fancy with Sino-Xenic. If you have well-attested regularities involving many words, you still might have difficulty (eg 接雜立壓 and others have SJ readings that point misleadingly to a final -t); with only a few words you lack adequate support. One sinologist notes that the Japanese write the name Tsushima with the graphs 對馬 and, assuming this must have sounded to them like tus-ma (why not tu-sma?) he reconstructs final -s for many words. The tag given reconstructions based on much imagination and little evidence is ex pedem Hercules, but this seems to me more like ex calculo Roma. I may know either too little phonology or too much Japanese, but I find that leap takes more faith than I can summon. A pity, really: I would love to be able to stun the sinological world by reconstructing final -s for 奧 from the place name 奧大利 Aus-tri-a.

Karlgren sticks a little star on the forehead of each of his creations. He did not originate the symbol; it is standard in historical linguistics to indicate that a cited form is reconstructed rather than attested, as for instance a word in vulgar Latin contrasted to one taken from a play by Terence. But since every reading in Archaic Chinese is, and necessarily must be, reconstructed, these stars swarm like gnats in summer, with not a whit more individual distinctiveness. They are as meaningful as flags on the Fourth of July in Peoria: no longer noticed except for the occasional absence, which can be ascribed to accidental oversight.

Some scholars who cite Karlgren's forms along with their own omit Karlgren's stars but apply them to their own Karlgrenoid reconstructions, as if to mark them as not merely hypothetical but hypo-hypothetical. This may be of some institutional use in the shin-kicking rope-climb that is academia, where precisely who did what needs to be sorted out down to the tiniest detail: A dotted i's, B crossed t's and C bussed r's. I stake no claims.

And there are those who do not know what the star stands for, like me when I first encountered it and tried to pronounce the thing.

The muscular strength which it gave to my jaw/ Has lasted the rest of my life.
I would spare others that agony.

So, for those who insist that no souvenir is authentic without a Made In Ruritania sticker, at the head of this page is a high-velocity splattered splotch of hypotheticality which you may reproduce ad libitum and stick wherever you will in token of the founder's motto of this firm:

It's All Guesswork.[®]

STRUCTURE OF ENTRIES

Items in square brackets [] are not present in all entries.

GSR Archaic Chinese, reconstructed as in GSR from Kuang Yün or other rime-book. Polysyllables including compounds are run together thus samk'üung. Reduplicative and semi-reduplicative binomes are hyphenated thus sək-sək, p'wät-lät. For a minority of these words I propose a modified reconstructed reading; these have the GSR head struck through and the modified reading inserted at right thus ~~kuäd~~ kuäd. In an early version of the data base which had to fit in very limited storage, some entries were truncated, eg b'jög'jög became b'jög'jög. Their tails are slowly being re-attached. Some entries had multiple readings thus kuäd kät. They will eventually be split into separate entries. Entries are alphabetized by head word in order of the sequence shown at the foot of the page. (NB all words are reconstructed to the same arbitrary norm without regard to time or place. No two words are sure to have co-existed in one dialect unless they are attested in the same homogeneous text. Some of these words were not in use as early as the readings reconstructed here for them might indicate.)

rime The category of Kuang Yün in which this word rimes in Ancient Chinese. For consistent numbering, I have linked 上平 and 下平, so that 下平/1/先 is given as 1.29. The rime-categories of Kuang Yün are listed in table 6 in volume II, p. 112.

word-class As in Cikoski 1970 & 1978, and as these have evolved since then. For technical reasons this is the item most prone to error in these entries. All are provisional.

gloss Typically taken from some Chinese word-book. My glosses aim at a proper definition, an explanatory phrase grammatically and semantically substitutable for the definiend, to give a modern English speaker the denotation, connotation and usage of the word. But most glosses simply parrot Chinese sources which are just trots or memory-joggers pointing to words already in the user's vocabulary. For example, two definitions of bank for a learner might be "land abutting flowing water" and "establishment accepting money deposits and making loans." A fluent speaker could be apprised of which I mean by the trots "river bank" and "savings bank." Chinese sources that define tend to use rough synonyms; in my English example, "bank is shore" and "bank is crib" might be two such. The user would be expected to know that bank and shore may not be interchangeable in every use, and that crib is on a different stylistic level from bank. (Laconic glosses can be cryptic: Kuang Yün glosses 肺 as 金藏, not "hoard of gold" but "metal viscera"—the lungs are classed with metal in the five-element scheme.) Other trots are the use-example, e.g. "launch from a bank" and "borrow from a bank," and the semantically vacuous context-indicator, used mostly of mimetics, "a way hills are," "a way water flows," and the like. Abbreviations are in appendix II pp. 764-5.

comparand-set Listed in table 4 in volume II, p. 159. These are sets of words whose sound and meaning are similar enough to suggest that they might be related in some way.

graphs How Chinese write this word. Graphs for polysyllables are written without spacing thus 丞相史. If a choice of graphs for a word exists, all are listed with spacing thus 牒牒牒 or 魍魎 罔兩 罔兩. The symbol □ stands for a graph illegible in its source text.

Citations follow definitions and consist of source, text and translation. Sources are indicated by single graphs; their full names are in appendix I, p. 763. Textual emendations are shown by square brackets. [X] means "insert X." [X↓] means "delete X." [X→]Y means "replace X with Y." My translations are idiomatic, not literal. For each CC sentence I try to provide an English sentence that says the same thing, as near as I can get, at the sentence level. I do not follow the phrasing of the original in detail. Where I consider the phrasing of the original worth attention, I append an italicized note to that effect. A word I cannot yet define is rendered in English with a nonsense-word. Entries may continue overleaf.

選：長歌正激烈中心愴以摧 Throughout my singing I am unfailingly loud and vigorous/ Within my heart is crushed and broken.

衡：人性怒則响吁喜則歌笑 It is human nature to shout when angry and to sing and laugh when happy.

b. rhythmic shout, work chant

淮：今夫舉大木者前呼邪許後亦應之此舉重勸力之歌也 Well, now, when people lift a big beam, the front shout, "Yo ho!" and the rear answer them: this is chanting to exert strength in heavy lifting.

非：茲鄭踞輦而歌前者止後者趨 Tzû Chêng crouched on the poles and called cadence, and those in front stopped while those in back surged ahead.

*The rhythmic chanting used to direct work gangs affected the prosody of everyday language. The chains of pedantically periodic sentences seen in CC prose as well as verse have prompted the inference that CC could not be a polished form of a spoken language. I suggest we ought to infer just the opposite, that infusion from a purely oral form can account for what is otherwise an improbable restriction to find imposed on what is claimed to be an ideographic language. 衡：楓桐之樹生而速長故其皮肌不能堅剛 Trees like sweet-gum and wu-tung grow fast all their lives, so their bark and wood cannot be hard and strong.

呂：難者曰白所以爲不物也黃所以爲不堅也黃白雜則不堅且不物也 Someone objected to that, "White is what makes it inflexible and yellow is what makes it not hard. With yellow and white mixed it is neither hard nor flexible."

史：故堅革利兵不足以爲勝高城深池不足以爲固嚴令繁刑不足以爲威 Thus hardened hide and sharpened weapons are not enough to cause victory. High walls and deep moats are not enough to cause security. Stern orders and many penalties are not enough to cause respect.

衡：此欲言堯以精誠射之精誠所加金石爲虧蓋誠無堅則亦無遠矣 This means to say that Yao shot it with total concentration. What is hit with total concentration, even if metal or stone, is damaged. If hardness actually is irrelevant to concentration then so would distance be.

史：以韓卒之勇被堅甲蹀躞弩帶利劍一人當百不足言也 It goes without saying that with their bravery, the Hán soldiers, wearing strong armor and drawing powerful crossbows, sharp swords at their sides, can withstand hundred-to-one odds.

呂：石可破也而不可奪堅 Stone can be broken but cannot be deprived of its hardness.

風：蓋天地剖分萬物萌毓非有典藝之文堅基可據 We find that since sky and earth first parted and the myriad things were born and grew, there has not been a standard canon of writings, a solid base on which to rely.

衡：由此言之精氣不能堅強審矣 Speaking of it in these terms, we have established that the essential vapor cannot be firm and strong.

釋：瓦蹀也蹀确堅貌也 ngwa "roof tile" is 史：楚雖有富大之名而實空虛其卒雖多然而輕走易北不能堅戰 Though Ch'ü has a reputation for wealth and size, it is actually a hollow one. Its troops may be numerous but they desert as if it meant little and retreat as if it were no big thing. They cannot be resolute in battle.

史：凡天下而以信約從親相堅者蘇秦封武安君相燕卽陰與燕王謀伐破齊而分其地 Su Ch'in, who united the world and made them mutually strong by relying on a firm treaty of vertical alliance, was enfeoffed as Lord Military Security. When he became premier to Yen then he secretly plotted with the king of Yen to attack and smash Ch'ü and divide that territory.

史：今從者一天下約爲昆弟〔刑→〕剗白馬以盟洎水之上以相堅也 Now the verticalizers have united the world, binding themselves to be as brothers, making their treaty with the sacrifice of a white horse on the bank of the Huan river, so as to strengthen each other.

史：陳侯欲往大夫曰吳新得意楚王雖亡與陳有故不可倍懷公乃以疾謝吳 The Marquess of Ch'ên wanted to go, but his great officers said, "Wu is a parvenu. Although the king of Ch'u is a fugitive, he has long-standing connections with Ch'ên, and may not be ignored." The Remembered Marquess thus declined Wu's invitation, pleading illness.

商：法者所以愛民也禮者所以便事也是以聖人苟可以強國不法其故苟可以利民不循其禮 Precepts are by their nature what one uses to preserve the folk, and etiquette to facilitate business. The sage, should he happen to find a way to strengthen the state, does not take an applicable precedent as precept, nor does he follow the applicable etiquette should he happen across a way to profit the folk.

c. gimmick, trick

戰：謂而不得有說色非故如何也 When I told you you couldn't have it, your expression was pleased. If that wasn't trickery what was it?

戰：以故掩人之邪者厚人之行也 To use contrivance to hide the misdeeds of others is the act of a generous man.

淮：上多故則民多詐矣 If their superiors often resort to contrivance then the folk will often employ deceit.

漢：敢問天道也抑人故也 I venture to ask whether that is from some natural cause or from man's contriving?

f. as mac adj, so, thus, therefore 論：吾少也賤故多能鄙事 When young I was of low status, so I acquired many humble skills.

墨：夫好美者豈曰吾族人莫之好故不好哉 It's absurd to suppose that a man who loves a beautiful woman would say, "None of my clan loves her, so I don't either!"

呂：三皇先教而後殺故事莫功焉 The three great ones put teaching first and killing last, so no one's affairs were more successful than theirs.

史：吾故列其行事次其時序毋令獨蒙惡聲焉 I thus set out his deeds and put his chronology in order so as to prevent there being nothing but evil spoken of him.

衡：豈古之天若屋廡之形去人不遠故共工得敗之女媧得補之乎 I very much doubt the sky in ancient times was like a roof or marquee, not far from people, so that Kung-kung could damage it and Nü-kua could repair it.

kuang 1.1 impartial, open to all 79 公 訟 新: 兼覆無私謂之公反公為私 Protecting all without favor is called impartiality; to invert impartiality is to be partial.

漢: 故民皆勸功樂業先公而後私 Thus people will all strive for success and enjoy their work, and will put public good before their private benefit.

荀: 夫不足非天下之公患也特墨子之私憂過計也 Now this insufficiency does not trouble the generality of mankind in the whole world, but is rather the personal vexation of Motzü at the failure of his plan.

藝: 非至公無以王天下 There is no means to rule the world as king except by utmost impartiality.

非: 公道 main roads, highways

戰: 盜賊公行 Thieves and murderers go about openly.

淮: 立私於公倚邪於正 They establish private agenda in public policy and lodge wrongdoing within what is right.

淮: 夫有形埒者天下訟見之 Things with distinct form, everyone sees them.

漢: 堪性公方自見孤立遂直道而不曲 Kan's nature was impartial and square; he took his own counsel and stood alone; he followed a straight path and never went crooked.

史: 民勇於公戰怯於私鬥 The people were fierce in general warfare but timid in private quarrels.

國: 未將事王叔簡公飲之酒交酬好貨皆厚飲酒宴語相說也 Before they took up business, the king's younger brother Chien gave a general drinking party. The repeated toasts and the party favors were all lavish. They drank and feasted and conversed, enjoying each other's company.

呂: 昔先聖王之治天下也必先公公則天下平矣平得於公嘗試觀於上志有得天下者眾矣其得之以公其失之必以偏 In the governing of the world by the sage kings of old, they always put impartiality first. If they were impartial then the world ran smoothly. Smooth running came from impartiality. We can test that by examining old accounts. There were many who got hold of the world, and they got it by impartiality. When they lost it, it must have been by being partial.

呂：凡主之立也生於公故鴻範曰無偏無黨王道蕩蕩無偏無頗遵王之義無或作奸遵王之道無或作惡遵王之路天下非一人之天下也天下之天下也陰陽之和不一類甘露時雨不私一物萬民之主不阿一人伯禽將行請所以治魯周公曰利而勿利也 The establishment of a ruler always arises from impartiality. Thus the Hung Fan says, “Neither leaning nor wavering/ The kingly way is smooth/ Neither leaning nor slanting/ Follow the kingly guidepost/ Never stir up your likes/ Follow the kingly way/ Never stir up your dislikes/ Follow the kingly road.” The world is not the lone man’s world; it is the world’s world. The harmony of yin and yang do not make only a single type of thing grow. The sweet dew and timely rain do not restrict themselves to any single crop. The ruler of myriad people does not lean toward any one man. When Po Ch’in was ready to leave he asked for advice about governing Lu. The Duke of Chou said, “Benefit them but don’t benefit from them.”

呂：荆人有遺弓者而不肯索曰荆人遺之荆人得之又何索焉孔子聞之曰去其荆而可矣老聃聞之曰去其人而可矣故老聃則至公矣 There was a man of Ching who lost a bow and refused to look for it. “A Ching man lost it,” he said, “and a Ching man will find it, so what point is there in looking for it?” Confucius heard of it and said, “Leave out ‘Ching’ and you’ve got it.” Lao Tan heard of it and said, “Leave out ‘man’ and you’ve got it.” Lao Tan was thus entirely impartial.

呂：天地大矣生而弗子成而弗有萬物皆被其澤得其利而莫知其所由始此三皇五帝之德也 Sky and earth are vast. They engender but do not nurture, further but do not possess. Everything is draped in their fertility and gains the benefit of it, and none knows from whence it originates. This was the power of the three titans and five supreme rulers.

呂：管仲有病桓公往問之曰仲父之病矣漬甚國人弗諱寡人將誰屬國管仲對曰昔者臣盡力竭智猶未足以知之也今病在於朝夕之中臣奚能言桓公曰此大事也願仲父之教寡人也管仲敬諾曰公誰欲相公曰鮑叔牙可乎管仲對曰不可夷吾善鮑叔牙鮑叔牙之為人也清廉潔直視不己若者不於人一聞人之過終身不忘勿已則隰朋其可乎隰朋之為人上也志而下求醜不若黃帝而哀不己若者其於國也有不聞也其於物也有不知也其於人也有不見也勿已乎則隰朋可也 Kuang Chung was ill and the Foursquare Marquess went to see him. He said, “Uncle, your illness is far advanced, so much so that our citizens no longer avoid speaking of it. To whom should I entrust the duties of state?” Kuan Chung replied, “I used to rack my brains with all my might and yet never could find an answer to that question. Now I am so ill I may have only a few hours left—what can I say?” The Foursquare Marquess said, “This is a most important thing; I want you to tell me, uncle.” Kuan Chung said, “I shall obey, my lord. To whom does your lordship wish to entrust them?” “Would Pao-shu Ya do?” “No. Pao-shu Ya’s character is pure and chaste and clean and straightforward. He looks on those not equal to himself as hardly human. Once he hears of a man’s wrongdoing, he never ever forgets it. If I must choose then I suppose Shih P’eng would do. Shih P’eng’s character makes him aspire upward but seek downward. He despises himself for not being the equal of Huang Ti and yet pities others who are not equal to himself. There are things about the state that he does not hear, things about affairs he does not know, things about people he does not see. If I must choose, Shih P’eng would do.”

呂：夫相大官也處大官者不欲小察不欲小智故曰大匠不斲大庖不豆大勇不鬥大兵不寇桓公行公去私惡用管子而為五伯長行私阿所愛用豎刀而蟲出於戶 The office of premier is a high one, and one who occupies a high office does not need to inspect minor details nor to take notice of petty matters. Thus it is said The master carpenter does not hew the wood/ The master chef does not serve the dishes/ The greatest bravery fights no duels/ The greatest army makes no bandit raids. When the Foursquare M practised impartiality and did away with his personal dislikes and employed Kuan-tzu he became the eldest of the five overlords. When he practised impartiality and elevated those he specially favored and employed Shu-tao the worms came out from under his door.

呂：人之少也愚其長也智故智而用私不若愚而用公日醉而飾服私利而立公貪戾而求王舜弗能為 When people are young they are ignorant but when they grow older they know more. Thus to be knowledgeable and use partiality is not equal to being ignorant and using impartiality. Being drunk in broad daylight while elegantly decorous, looking out for one’s own interest while being firmly impartial, being avaricious and crooked while seeking to rule as king—Shun couldn’t do these things.

孟：秦穆公 the Awe-inspiring Earl of Ch'in

There is an idle tale that all rulers were posthumously promoted to duke, as illustrated by these two references to the same man:

春：蔡侯考父卒 Kao-fu, Marquess of Ts'ai, died.

春：葬蔡宣公 They buried the Perspicuous Marquess of Ts'ai.

Sinological practice is to translate locutions like 蔡宣公 as "Duke Hsian of Ts'ai". If the aim of translation is to replace Chinese with equivalent English, this will not do. This man's personal name was not 宣 s'uan but 考父 K'òu'f'ü. His personal name was tabu. While he lived he was called 公 (or 君) "ruler". Perspicuous was an epithet that he was given after he had died, like bold and unready in Charles the Bold and Ethelred the Unready. His posthumous name was the equivalent of The Bold Ruler and The Unready Ruler. In this context, the two uses of 公 are distinct: placename 公 is "Duke of Place"; epithet 公 is "the epithet deceased ruler." V. prec ud, also discussion under 子 ts'ia "hierarchical leader."

Scouting the terrain beforehand and noted the defiles and declivities, distinguishing what would help and what hinder, so that the three wings of the army did not go astray on the march was the work of Pa Ning and Tsuan Hsiang. What held up rewards and punishments before and made the people behind realize that they would be held to them was YL's making clear the laws. The one who perceived that the enemy was vulnerable and beat the drum to signal the attack, never daring to slacken or weary was me. Why should YL single out the fact that my right arm did not get tired as the ground for rewarding me? If it is because of my having the victory, how much of my work went into it? The king said, "Bravo." He thereupon sought out the descendants of Wu Ch'i and rewarded them with two hundred thousand fields, with a hundred thousand each to Pa Ning and Tsuan Hsiang. The king said, "How could Kung-shu not be the chief of these? Having won a victory for Us over a strong enemy, he then capped it by not ignoring the descendants of competent ones nor hiding the deeds of capable officers. How could we not give him even more?" So he added an additional four hundred thousand on top of the original million, to be a million four hundred thousand in all.

楚果弗與地則五國之事困也 Five nations made a treaty with Ch'ü to attack Ch'i. Chao Yang said to the king of Ch'ü, "When the five nations have been its instrument of smashing Ch'i, Ch'ü is sure to turn its attention south to Ch'ü." When the king asked what to do about it, he replied, "The Hán family grip the state; they are self-aggrandizing but wary of conflict. That means they can be corralled by greed and controlled by fear. If we offer them a huge bribe so as to fill their minds with thoughts of what they stand to gain we will certainly rein them in, and if we then overawe them with the full extent of our military might they will surely be afraid of us. With them afraid of our might and governed by our wealth, anything the alliance of five do can be brought to nothing. And after they have broken the treaty, we need not even cede them any land." The king approved and sent Ta Kung as envoy to Hán. He met with Kung-chung and said, "The business at Niu-lan and the trouble at Ma-ling are things your king himself has seen. If the king would refrain from taking any military action on account of the alliance of five, we would like to cede certain territory of ours to you, to wit five cities, and we would also like to mobilize our full power in defense of Ch'i." After Ch'i had repulsed Chao and Wei, Ch'ü did not cede the territory after all; thus was the alliance of five founded. [probably the 公仲修 in the folg entry]

They shifted away from growing grain, not making it a priority. Pu-chu fled among the barbies, having mismanaged his office. Pu-chu died and his son Chu succeeded. Chu died and Kung-liu succeeded.

史: 公劉雖在戎狄之間復修后稷之業務耕種行地宜自漆沮度渭取材用行者有資居者有畜積民賴其慶百姓懷之多徙而[保→]依歸焉周道之興自此始故詩人歌樂思其德 Although Kung-liu was among barbarians, he revived the project of Hou Chi, concentrating on plowing and planting. He moved where the land was suitable, from the Ch'i and Ch'ü across the Wei to get supplies. Those who traveled had sustenance and those who stayed behind built up stores. The folk relied on his good fortune. People remembered him and many emigrated to give him their allegiance. The rise of the way of Chou began from this. Thus the poets recalled in song and music what they owed him.

kæg'zo to exorcise ghosts 229 解除

衡：世信祭祀謂祭祀必有福又然解除謂解除必去凶 Everyone believes in sacrifices and ceremonies, claiming that they must surely bring good fortune. They also assume exorcism is valid, claiming that exorcism must surely expel ill fortune.

衡：解除初禮先設祭祀比夫祭祀若生人相賓客矣先爲賓客設膳食已驅以刃杖鬼神如有知必恚[止→]與戰不肯徑去若懷恨反而爲禍如無所知不能爲凶解之無益不解無損 As the initial ceremony of an exorcism, they first set out a sacrifice. Compare that sacrifice to living people entertaining guests by first setting out a fine feast and then when they have finished eating, driving them off with swords and pikes. If ghosts have consciousness, they will surely resent being fought with and be unwilling to zip right off. If they harbor resentment, they will turn around and cause misfortune. If they have no consciousness, they cannot cause ill fortune, so exorcising them does no good and not exorcising them does no harm.

衡：且人謂鬼神何如狀哉如謂鬼有形象象生人人生人懷恨必將害人如無形象與煙雲同驅逐雲煙亦不能除 Furthermore, what do people claim ghosts look like? If they say ghosts have a shape, they look like living people. When living people harbor resentment, they are sure to do harm to someone. If ghosts have no shape, they are the same as clouds and smoke. If you try to shoo away clouds and smoke, you can't disperse them.

衡：形既不可知心亦不可圖鬼神集止人宅欲何求乎如勢欲殺人當驅逐之時避人隱匿驅逐之止則復還立故處如不欲殺人寄托人家雖不驅逐亦不爲害 Not only can their shape not be determined, nor can their minds be estimated. When ghosts gather in someone's house, what is it they are after? If they [1g] want to kill people, then while the exorcism is being conducted they will hide somewhere to avoid people, and then when the exorcism is finished they will come back again to where they had been before. If they don't want to kill people, if they merely are taking advantage of someone's house to lodge in, then even if we don't exorcise them they will do no harm.

欲何求乎如[勢→]執欲殺人當驅逐之時避人隱匿驅逐之止則復還立故處如不欲殺人寄托人家雖不驅逐亦不爲害 Not only can their shape not be determined, nor can their minds be estimated. When ghosts gather in someone's house, what is it they are after? If they are bound and determined to kill people, then while the exorcism is being conducted they will hide somewhere to avoid people, and then when the exorcism is finished they will come back again to where they had been before. If they don't want to kill people, if they merely are taking advantage of someone's house to lodge in, then even if we don't exorcise them they will do no harm.

衡：貴人之出也萬民并觀填街滿巷爭進在前士卒驅之則走而卻士卒還去即復其處士卒立守終日不離僅能禁止何則欲在於觀不爲壹驅還也使鬼神與生人同有欲於宅中猶萬民有欲於觀也士卒驅逐不久立守則觀者不卻也然則驅逐鬼者不極一歲鬼神不去今驅逐之終食之間則舍之矣舍之鬼復還來何以禁之 When some gawdee goes out of his mansion, everyone gathers to gawk at him, crowding the streets and filling the alleys, fighting with each other to get to the fore. If the guards chase them away, they run and scatter, but when the guards desist they return to where they had been. If the guards merely stand guard, they will never go away and can barely be kept off. Why?

Because they want to be in a position to gawk, and will not go home merely because of being chased away once. If we suppose that ghosts are the same as living people in that when they want something in a house they are like people wanting to gawk at something, so that when the guards chase them away and do not stand ready to keep them away the gawkers do not disperse, then when we exorcise ghosts if we don't keep it up all year round the ghosts will not go away. But what we do is to exorcise them for no longer than the time it takes to eat a meal and then we quit. As soon as we quit the ghosts would come right back and how would we stop them? 衡：暴谷於庭雞雀啄之主人驅彈則走縱之則來不終日立守雞雀不禁使鬼神乎不爲驅逐去止使鬼不神乎與雞雀等不常驅逐不能禁也 When grain is set to dry in the sun in a courtyard, chickens and sparrows peck at it. So long as the householder chases them and throws pebbles at them they will flee, but as soon as he leaves off they will come again. Unless he stands guard all day the chickens and sparrows will not be kept off. Do we assume ghosts have magic power? Then they are not going to go away on account of being shooed off. Do we assume they lack divine power? Then in the same manner as chickens and sparrows they will not be permanently shooed away.

釋: 教倣也下所法倣也 kōg “teach” is g'ōg “imitate”; what juniors take as model and imitate 准: 御可以教刺舟 A cart driver can be taught to pole a boat.

史: 寡人不肖未嘗得聞明教 I'm not very smart. I've never had the chance to hear clear teaching.

戰: 有一人過曰善射可教射也矣 A man passing by said, “You're a good archer but you need to learn some things about archery.”

史: 以秦士民之眾兵法之教可以吞天下稱帝而治 With the number of soldiers and officers Ch'in has and their state of military training, you can engulf the world, call yourself emperor and thus reign. 法: 學行之上也言之次也教人又其次也咸無焉焉眾人 As for learning; putting it into action is highest. Discussing it is next. Teaching it is even lower, and to do none of these qualifies one as common.

釋: 笏忽也君有教命及所啟白則書其上備忽忘也 χmwal “writing tablet” is χmwal “careless”; when the ruler has orders he wants to transmit or something he wants to publicize he writes them down on this lest he absent-mindedly forget.

孟: 今有璞玉於此雖萬鎰必使玉人彫琢之至於治國家則曰姑舍女所學而從我則何以異於教玉人彫琢玉哉 For example, you would surely have a jade-man carve a lump of raw jade, even one worth zillions. When it comes to governing a state, to say, “Drop your learning for a while and obey me,” how would that differ from teaching jade-men to carve jade?

呂: 故往教者不化召師者不化自卑者不聽卑師者不聽 Thus one who obeys a summons to teach does not enlighten and one who summons a teacher will not be enlightened; one who abases himself will not be heard and one who abases his teacher will not attend to his doctrine.

漢: 於是梁奇其意乃教以兵法 At that, Liang saw his ambition was extraordinary, and then taught him military tactics and strategy.

國: 所怒甚多而不備大難以是教王王能久乎 He makes far too many people angry, yet makes no preparation for major difficulty. If that is what he teaches the king, can the king last very long?

漢: 夫萬民之從利也如水之走下不以教化隄防之不能止也 The way everyone goes after profit is like how water runs downward. If you do not block it by instruction and enlightenment, it cannot be stopped.

戰: 今之嗣主忽於至道皆昏於教亂於迷途於言或於語沈於辯溺於辭 Rulers who have acceded to power in our time are oblivious to the perfect way. They are all dimmed by instruction, mixed up about governance, misled by words, misguided by sayings, sunk in glibness and drowned by phrases.

禮: 天有四時春秋冬夏風雨霜露無非教也 The seasons are of the sky. Spring, summer, fall, winter, wind, rain, frost, dew—none teaches falsely. 史: 因民而教不勞而成功緣法而治者吏習而民安之 Giving the sort of instructions people expect brings success with little effort. Governing by standard rules means the officials will follow routine and the people will feel unthreatened by them.

史: 教之化民也深於命民之效上也捷於令

The transformation of the people by teaching is deeper than that by command; the compliance of the people with the example of their superiors is quicker than that to orders.

b. persuade 國: 優施教驪姬夜半而泣 Shih the actor instructed Lady Li to weep in the middle of the night. 漢: 公卿大夫所使總方略壹統類廣教化美風俗也 The high officers of state are the ones whom We commission to organize the coordination of plans, keep chains of command and assignments uniform, broaden Our civilizing influence and raise the general standard of behavior.

漢: 食足貨通然後國實民富而教化成 When food is sufficient and goods trade freely, only then is the state solid and the people rich; then indoctrination can succeed.

戰: 夫晉獻公欲伐郭而憚申之僑存荀息曰周書有言美女破舌乃遣之女樂以亂其政府之僑諫而不聽遂去因而伐郭遂破之又欲伐虞而憚宮之奇存荀息曰周書有言美男破老乃遣之美男教之惡宮之奇宮之奇以諫而不聽遂亡因而伐虞遂取之 Now when the Exemplary Marquess of Chin wanted to attack Kuo but was deterred by the presence there of Chou-chih-ch'iao, Hsün Hsi said, “In Chou writings it says beautiful women destroy voices.” So they sent a present of singing girls to disrupt their governance. Chou-chih-ch'iao objected but was not listened to. So he departed and they then attacked Kuo and went ahead and destroyed it. Then he also wanted to attack Yü but was deterred by the presence there of Kung-chih-ch'i. Hsün Hsi said, “In Chou writings it says handsome men destroy seniority.” So they sent him a handsome man who induced him to hate Kung-chih-ch'i. Kung-chih-ch'i objected but was not listened to, so he exiled himself and they then attacked Yü and went ahead and seized it.

c. social or religious doctrine

史: 始秦戎翟之教父子無別同室而居今我更制其教 In the original barbarous customs of Chin, there was no separation of father and son, they dwelling in the same house. Now I have restructured their customs.

史: 發教封內而巴人致貢施德諸侯而八戎來服 He taught the whole country, and the Pa sent tribute to him; he made all the barons obliged to him and the eight Jung came to submit.

The viewpoint of Lord Shang is that such customs are entirely of a top-down nature, originating in the authority of the state. I suggest that as his reason for calling them 教 rather than 俗.

晉: 既興利而除害亦威眾以立權所謂神道設教率由於此 Given that they cause benefit and do away with harm, they also overawe the multitude, letting power be firmly held. The saying, “The way of the spirits establishes doctrine” likely comes from this.

呂：僂至巧也人不愛僂之指而愛己之指有一之利故也人不愛崑山之玉江漢之珠而愛己一蒼璧小璣有之利故也今吾生之為我有而利我亦大矣論其貴賤爵為天子不足以比焉論其輕重富有天下不可以易之論其安危一曙失之終身不復得此三者有道者之所慎也

Ch'ü was supremely skilful, yet others care nothing for his fingers but are solicitous of their own fingers, because having them is beneficial to them. No one begrudges the Kun mountain its jades or the Yangtze and Han rivers their pearls, but each is jealous of his own lone green jade circlet or tiny seed pearl, because having them is beneficial to them. In this regard, my life's being my own possession and beneficial to me is hugely important. If we classify its honor, the rank of emperor is not comparable to it. If we classify its price, the wealth of the whole world is not to be exchanged for it. If we classify its security, the loss of it for an eyeblink will never be made good. These three things are what those who have the way pay attention to.

呂：有慎之而反害之者不達乎性命之情也不達乎性命之情慎之何益是師者之愛子也不免乎枕之以糠是聾者之養嬰兒也方雷而窺之于堂殊弗知慎者 That some pay attention to them and yet contrarily harm them is because they have not got through to the actuality of life and fate. If they haven't got through to the actuality of life and fate, what good does it do to pay attention to them? That's like a blind man caring for a child; it wouldn't occur to him not to pillow it on a pile of chaff. That's like a deaf man nursing a baby; when thunder has just roared he stares at it in the hall. Some people just don't know how to pay attention to them.

呂：夫弗知慎者是死生存亡不可未始有別也未始有別者其所謂是未嘗是其所謂非未嘗非是其所謂非非其所謂是此之謂大惑若此人者天之所禍也以此治身必死必殃以此治國必殘必亡 Now if one doesn't know how to pay attention to them, that's the same as if life and death, survival and annihilation, possible and impossible have not been distinguished from the start. In that case, what they say is true may be false and what they say is false may be true, and what we term the greatest confusion is to claim truth for falsehood and vice versa. Men like this are those to whom Sky sends calamity.

If you govern yourself by this

You will surely meet death and desolation 'iang

If you govern your nation by this

You will surely be cut off and annihilated. miwang

呂：夫死殃殘亡非自至也惑召之也壽長至常亦然故有道者不察所召而察其召之者則其至不可禁矣此論不可不熟使鳥獲疾引牛尾尾絕力動而牛不可行逆也使五尺豎子引其權而牛恣所以之順也世之人主貴人無賢不肖莫不欲長生久視而日逆其生欲之何益 Now death, desolation, extinction and annihilation do not come of themselves; something brings them about, as is also the case for longevity, extension and perpetuation. Thus one who has the way looks closely not at his aims but at his means; thus their attainment cannot be prevented. One must become entirely familiar with this analysis. Let Wu Huo pull an ox's tail until his strength fails him or the tail breaks off; the ox cannot be made to go, because that goes backward. Let a three-foot tall boy pull its nose-ring and it will go wherever he leads it, because that goes forward. The rulers and the high and mighty of our time, whether competent or not, all want to stay alive for a long time, yet every day they try to make their lives go backward; what good does it do them to want it?

呂：凡生之長也順之也使生不順者欲也故聖人必先適欲室大則多陰臺高則多陽多陰則蹙多陽則瘵此陰陽不適之患也是故先王不處大室不為高臺味不眾珍衣不燁熱燁熱則理塞理塞則氣不達味眾珍則胃充胃充則中大輓中大輓而氣不達以此長生可得乎 All long lives are to be due to compliance. What makes life uncompliant is desire. Thus the sage puts first priority on controlling desire. If one's house is large there is too much yin; if one's towers are high there is too much yang. Too much yin causes gout; too much yang causes arthritis. This is the suffering caused by imbalance of yin and yang. Thus the former kings did not dwell in large houses or make high towers. They did not use many and rare seasonings, nor did was their clothing thickly padded and hot. Such clothing blocks the veins, keeping the energy-vapor from getting through; many rare and precious seasonings fill the stomach, leading to constipation. Constipated and with energy-vapor not getting through, can long life be obtained by these means?

所以養性也非好儉而惡費也節乎性也 The sage kings of old had courtyards, gardens, parks and pools made enough to look at and relax their frames, that is all; they had halls, houses, towers and pavilions made enough to avoid the head and damp, that is all; they had horse-carriages and clothing provided enough to rest the body and warm the bones, that is all; they had food and drink made and wine brewed enough to adjust flavors and fill their emptiness, that is all; they had shows and music made enough to comfort their lives and lift their spirits, that is all. These five were the sage kings way of nurturing life—not because they loved frugality and hated expense, but because they were constrained by what life is.

荀：今夫狴狴形笑亦二足而有[有]毛也然而君子啜其羹食其藪 The ape has a ridiculous shape; it also has two legs but has fur. Nonetheless courtiers drink its soup and eat its carved flesh.

中：今夫天斯昭昭之多及其無窮也日月星辰繫焉萬物覆焉今夫地一撮土之多及其廣厚載華嶽而不重振河海而不洩萬物載焉今夫山一卷石之多及其廣大草木生[之]焉禽獸居之寶藏興焉今夫水一勺之多及其不測電鼉鯨龍魚鱉生焉貨財殖焉 Consider the sky in its bright quantity [in daytime]; when it becomes infinite [at night], the sun, moon and stars are hung from it and all things are covered by it. [In daylight we see only what appears to be a finite canopy with perhaps some clouds beneath it. When the brightness fades its true dimensions become visible.] Consider earth in the quantity of one pinch of dirt; when it comes to be wide and deep, it supports the Hua mountain and finds it not too heavy, supports the sea and the rivers and they do not overflow. Everything rides on it. Consider mountains in the quantity of a handful of stones; when they come to be wide and big, foliage and trees live among them, birds and animals occupy them and troves of valuables arise from them. Consider water in the quantity of a dipperful; when it comes to be wide and fathomless, snapping turtles, alligators, sharks, dragons and turtles and fish live in it and commodities grow in it.

c. in fact acw theory

衡：今日西轉不復見者非入也 In fact, that the sun rolls west and does not reappear is not because it has gone inside something.

多：今則不然 In fact, that did not happen.

隋：以蓋圖視天河起斗而東入狼弧間曲如輪今視天河直如繩何也 Looking at the Milky Way on a parasol-chart, it arises in tou and enters between lang and ku. It is bent like a wheel. But if we look at the actual Milky Way it is straight as a string. Why is that?

荀：今人之化師法積文學道禮義者為君子縱性情安恣睢而違禮義者為小人 In fact, those who are educated by teacher and model, who accumulate learning and take propriety and right conduct as their way become courtiers. Those who give free rein to their instincts, have no compunction in doing just as they please and who ignore propriety and right conduct become petty men.

 Hsi said, "I can pile up twelve go-stones and nine eggs on top of them." The marquess said, "I haven't studied much, but I've never seen that. Do that for me." Sun Hsi composed his countenance and focused his will; he piled go-stones vertically and added eggs on top of them. The entourage gasped in alarm; the Numinous Marquess bent double and did not continue breathing.
 He said, "That's precarious!" Sun Hsi said, "YL has respect. He left the court and told his son, "Yü is doomed.

Only with integrity and reliability can we allow the presence of foreign invaders without suffering harm.
Eliminating deceit in responding to outsiders, we call that integrity. Having a firm attitude in one's dealings, we call that reliability. Now our ruler is doing to others things he dislikes for himself; deceit is not cleared away. He is destroying relatives for a bribe; his attitude is not firm. A state cannot rest on anything but integrity and cannot be stable by anything but honesty.

Having violated integrity and honesty in dealing with foreign invaders, the invaders will recognize his vulnerability and turn their plans to him. Having pulled up his root, how can he last long? If we don't flee I fear we will be caught up in it." He took his immediate kiüŋtieng bronze vessels at Chou court, stb symbols of rule of world (v. 鼎) 九 鼎

The word wr 九 here is traditionally taken to be the number nine, but the explanation of its significance looks like an ad hoc fabrication. It seems that either Yü the great or his son had them cast to symbolize the nine divisions of China. Yü is mythical and at the time to which he is ascribed neither metallurgy nor nine divisions existed in China.

Bronze casting began in the Shang, and was then developed to a technical peak not regained for a millennium after the Chou broke their hegemony. The bronze vessels of the Chou were patently inferior to those of their predecessors. Moreover, such vessels were among the most coveted types of loot. There were not nine of them in the great city Shang, there were dozens, and they were taken by the Chou conquerors not as symbols of reign but as spoils of war.

No specific set of nine cauldrons is consistently named by this term in different texts. It originally meant “collected bronzes”, and could be applied now to the Eumorfopoulos and Brandage collections.

As a symbol, the cauldrons seem to be ignored by Confucians; before Han, only Legalists and Mohists speak of them in that manner. After the Han dynasty, when sovereignty was for centuries a fleeting phantasm, a few looted bronzes may have been shuffled from kinglet to kinglet in a pathetic attempt to feign continuity with the empires of the past, but it is not likely that any of them was a relic of the Shang.

藝：神鼎者質文精也知吉凶存亡能輕能重能息能行不灼而沸不汲自盈中生五味昔黃帝作鼎象太一禹治水收天下美銅以為九鼎象九州王者興則出衰則去 The material and decoration of magic cauldrons are of fine quality. They can tell good fortune from bad, survival from doom. They can be light or heavy, quiescent or active. They boil without heating, fill themselves without the drawing of water. They provide flavorings within themselves. Huang Ti had cauldrons made with the image of the Big Blob. When Yü controlled the waters, he gathered all the fine bronze in the world to make nine cauldrons, imaging the nine regions of China. When kingly rulers arise, they appear; when in decline, they go away.

墨：九鼎既成遷於三國 After the cauldrons have been completed they will shift among three nations. 左：武王克商遷九鼎于維邑義士猶或非之而況將昭違亂之賂器於大廟 When The Martial King conquered Shang, he moved the cauldrons to Luo city; even so, some upright officers condemned that. How, then, of your intention to make a display of this bribe of waywardness and disorder in the grand temple?

戰：據九鼎按圖籍挾天子以今天下 lay our hands on the cauldrons, run our fingers down the tax roll maps, seize the emperor and order the whole world about 戰：秦興師臨周而求九鼎…夫鼎者非效盥壺醬甄耳可懷挾提挈以至齊者非效鳥集鳥飛兔與

馬逝灑然止於齊者 Ch'in raised a force to dominate Chou and demand the cauldrons... These cauldrons are not like pickle jars or sauce bottles; their lifting-handles are of a size to embrace with your arms. Hoisting them and getting them to Ch'i will be nothing like birds flocking, crows flying, rabbits hopping, horses galloping, blithely flitting into Ch'i.

竹：[湯]二十七年遷九鼎于商邑 In the 27th year [of T'ang] the cauldrons were transferred to the city Shang.

竹：[武王]十五年…冬遷九鼎于洛 In the fifteenth year [of The Martial King]... in winter the cauldrons were transferred to Luo.

竹：四十二年九鼎淪泗沒于淵 In 326 BC the cauldrons fell into the Szü and sank in a deep hole.

史：威烈王二十三年九鼎震 In 403 BC the cauldrons shook (shaken by earthquake?).

史：四十二年…謂梁王…請以九鼎自入於王 In 273 BC...said to the king of Liang...“Let me get the cauldrons submitted to YM on my own initiative.”

史：五十九年…秦取九鼎寶器而遷西周公於愚狐 In 256 BC...Ch'in took the cauldrons and treasures and moved the West Chou ruler to Tan-hu.

史：五十二年周民東亡其器九鼎入秦周初亡 In 256 BC the people of Chou fled eastward. Their treasures and cauldrons went to Ch'in. That was the beginning of the end of Chou.

史：始皇還過彭城齋戒禱祠欲出周鼎泗水使千人沒水求之弗得 Returning, the first emperor passed P'eng-ch'êng, where he fasted and prayed, hoping to recover the Chou cauldrons from the Szü River. He send a thousand divers down, but did not get them.

漢：史記周威烈王二十三年九鼎震金震木動之也是時周室衰微刑重而虐號令不從以亂金氣鼎者宗廟之寶器也宗廟將廢寶鼎將遷故震動也是歲晉三卿韓魏趙篡晉君而分其地威烈王命以為諸侯天子不恤同姓而爵其賊臣天下不附矣後三世周致德祚於秦其後秦遂滅周而取九鼎九鼎之震木珍金失眾甚 The Shih Chi, in the 23rd year of the Magnificently Imperious King, says that the cauldrons shook. When metal shakes it is because wood makes it move. At that time the house of Chou had weakened, its punishments were cruelly severe, its orders were not obeyed, to the detriment of the energy of metal. Cauldrons are the treasured vessels of the ancestral temple. When the ancestral temple is to be abandoned the cauldrons are about to shift their location, and thus they begin to shake. In this year, three grand officers of Chin—Hán, Wei and Chao—took control from the Chin ruler and divided his territory. The Magnificently Imperious King made them feudal lords. When the emperor has no sympathy for one of his own surname but ennobles his rebellious ministers, the world will no longer pay allegiance. Three generations later Chou allowed their divine power to pass to Ch'in. After that Ch'in proceeded to destroy Chou and take the nine cauldrons. When the nine cauldrons shook, wood was vitiating metal; they had greatly forfeited the allegiance of the people.

晉：王叔云季徙都西周九鼎淪沒 King Nan came in turn to be last of his line. He removed his capital to West Chou and the nine cauldrons sank and vanished. 梁：二者欲更鑄九鼎 For the second thing, I want to cast a new set of nine cauldrons.

b. high-priced, expensive

漢：常苦枯旱亡有平歲穀賈翔貴 They often suffered the bitterness of a withering drought, never having a normal harvest; the price of grain shot up.

淮：世以為裘者難得貴賈之物也 Everyone considers fur cloaks to be things that are hard to get and high-priced.

戰：曰何貴曰貴正 "What does he emphasize?"

草：但貴則難省煩復為單務取易為易知非常儀也 They only valued eliminating difficulty and minimizing trouble; they reduced double forms to single; they made it a point to choose what was easy to make and easy to recognize. That was not meant as a permanent standard.

呂：力貴突智貴卒得之同則趨為上勝之同則濕為下 The most valued kind of strength is that which erupts suddenly; the most valued kind of intelligence is that which deals with emergencies. Of equal gains, the soonest ranks highest. Of equal abilities, the most underachieving ranks lowest.

c. opposite 賤

衡：糶穀之人貴賤其價 The men who buy grain raise or lower its price.

衡：以風占貴賤者 those who predict prices based on the wind

荀：隆禮貴義者其國治賤禮賤義者其國亂 Where ritual is exalted and right conduct is honored, the state is ordered; where ritual is skimmed and right conduct despised, the state is disordered.

淮：故愚者有所惰智者有所不足柱不可以摘齒筐不可以持屋馬不可以服重牛不可以追速鉛不可以為刀銅不可以為弩鐵不可以為舟木不可以為釜各用之於其所適施之於其所宜即萬物一齊而無由相過夫明鏡便於照形其於以函食不如簞犧牛粹毛宜於廟牲其於以致雨不若黑蜮由此觀之物無貴賤因其所貴而貴之物無不貴也因其所賤而賤之物無不賤也 Thus the stupid have things they are good at while the wise have deficiencies: a post cannot be used to pick one's teeth while a splinter cannot hold up a roof. A horse cannot be hitched to a heavy cart while an ox cannot be urged to run fast. Lead cannot make knives, bronze cannot make crossbows, iron cannot make boats, wood cannot make cooking pots; each is to be used where it suits. If you apply them where they fit, then all things are equal and none of them has any cause to exceed any of the others. A bright mirror is good for reflecting shapes, but for holding food it is not so good as a serving-basket. A sacred cow, with its hair all of one color, is fit to be sacrificed in the ancestral temple, but for bringing rain it is not so good as a black li-snake. Viewed from this, nothing is either valuable or worthless. Valuing things by how they are valuable, nothing is not valuable; vice versa, nothing is not worthless.

後：中常侍曹節王甫欲用貴人禮殯帝曰太后親立朕躬統承大業 The regular palace attendants Ts'ao Chieh and Wang Fu wanted to conduct her funeral by the rites for a consort of the first rank. The emperor said, "The empress dowager began Our body in her own person, accepting and continuing the great [ie imperial] lineage.

後：且馮貴人冢墓被發骸骨暴露與賊併尸魂靈汙染且無功於國何宜上配至尊 Furthermore, the grave mound of Consort-of-first-rank Feng was subjected to pillage. Her bones were left out in the open, exposed in the same manner as those of criminals. The supernatural force of her remnant spirit was polluted and will do no good for the state. How could she be suited to be paired with the most highly honored one?

kjwər'jien ^{nc} bogles in general 鬼神

If Bronislaw Malinowski's observation that superstition is stronger among people in high-risk situations holds in general then we should expect to find it strong in the imperial court and the royal courts that preceded it, all of which were seething cauldrons of deadly intrigue, and we do.

The difference between a 鬼 and a 神 (qqu) is worth considering on account of the important role that attitudes toward these played in influencing behavior. First, there is a lexical difference: 鬼 writes only one word, a noun, while 神 writes two words, a noun and a homophonous stative verb. I suggest the verb as the older of the two words.

The comparands I've chosen contrast sharply. Words I compare to 神 have to do with fruiting, solidity, accuracy, timeliness and evidence. The verb meant something like "able to make one feel the manifestation of an invisible power". The noun then referred to that power as manifested. Words I compare to 鬼 have to do with strangeness, weirdness, scariness, pollution or tabu. Examples of their use in CC fit with that contrast, namely that a generic 神 is neutral vis-à-vis humans: neither ill-nor well-intentioned, merely to be placated or entreated as situations require. A 鬼 is typically a baleful thing, to be exorcised rather than dealt with as a rational sentence.

Other than that, the two nouns have much in common. Either can refer to the spirit of a dead person, or to something supernatural that never was human. There is thus some interchange between them, and one may encounter a tale of a benevolent 鬼 or a malevolent 神.

The question arises of where these bogles hide when they are not manifest, which is most of the time. The verb used to label the manifestation of a 神 is typically 降, suggesting a place overhead (v. 天). The verb for the appearance of a 鬼 is typically 現, seeming to suggest that it was there all along, just invisible. Can we say that one difference is that 神 rise and sink like lemon pips in ginger ale while 鬼 remain earthbound, or are there earth-bound 神 also?

The 神 of the dead are said to be present at the sacrificial meal in their honor; they are also said to be present in the 主 "spirit-tablets" placed in their names in the ancestral temple, but whether they are always present there or only come when summoned by being addressed by an officiant is not clear.

It is easy to muddle our understanding of these concepts on their own terms with notions from European religions. The idea that a human soul goes to heaven as a reward for a good life has nothing to do with ancient Chinese ideas of 神 and 天. Sky's payback for good and evil always occurs before death, and may take the form of death itself. The idea of hell is not mentioned until introduced as part of Buddhism. And 神 does not correspond to soul as a zero-mass organ of the human corpus. We also have 氣 "energy", 精 "essence", 魄 "animator" and 魂 "mind-stuff" (qqu). None of these has the independent moral agency ascribed to the human soul.

All these terms were used in advocating and criticising policy decisions. In reading about them we can discern several attitudes to 鬼 and 神. One is simple incredulity. Another is to grant that there may be something to them but to refuse to get involved. A third is pietism, the exploitation of abstract supernatural doctrines for cynical concrete ends. Another is what simply must be termed religious belief. The structure of this belief and the pietism that exploits it can be hard to see as anything more than a random lot of detailed superstitions, but an effort should be made. Taking shortcuts by tacitly introducing western concepts like God, soul or heaven leads you away from, not toward, understanding what CC texts have to tell us. Words like holy, prayer, worship, reverence and sanctity, all hard to define even in the context of a familiar religion, should be avoided in translation, or used only with strenuous efforts at objective precision.

史：帝紂資辨捷疾聞見其敏材力過人手格猛獸知足以距諫言足以飾非 The emperor Ch'ou was naturally articulate and clever, extremely alert to notice things; his talent exceeded others'—he had the strength to face wild animals bare-handed, the intelligence to fend off criticism and the verbal power to make wrong seem right.

國：吾欲已子張之諫若何 I want to put a stop to the remonstrances of Tz'ü-chang; how do I go about it?

史：帝欲自將擊匈奴群臣諫皆不聽皇太后固要帝乃止 HIM wanted to take personal command in attacking the Hsiung Nu. The whole government objected, but he paid no attention. The empress dowager demanded it of HIM, and only then did he desist.

史：父有過子三諫不聽則隨而號人臣三諫不聽則其義可以去矣 If a father errs, his son remonstrates three times; if ignored, he obeys but with lamentation. If a minister remonstrates three times and is ignored then the bond of obligation may be considered broken on that ground.

衡：案世間能建蹇蹇之節成三諫之議令將檢身自敕不敢邪曲者率多儒生 I point out those of our time who are able to establish strict limits and establish the obligation of three remonstrances and make generals examine and correct themselves, not daring to act in divergent or crooked ways; they are by and large Confucians.

 者勝眾之資也 Always in governing the world one must use human nature. Human nature has likes and dislikes and thus rewards and punishments are of use.
 Since rewards and punishments are of use, regulations can be established and thus the path of good order is complete. The ruler grasps the handle and sits in the power position, and thus his orders are carried out and his prohibitions prohibit. What I mean by the handle is the control of life and death. What I mean by the power position is the wherewithal to overcome multitudes.

kwō̄kshānjēn mp man name 郭舍人

史：武帝時有所幸倡郭舍人者發言陳辭雖不合大道然令人主和說 In the time of the Martial Emperor of Han there was an entertainer Kuo Shē-jên who was a court favorite. He would say things that, though they made no sense in real world terms, still by their phrasing amused the ruler and kept him happy. 藝：皇帝曰日月星辰和四時…郭舍人曰鬻 [妃女→] 衡性唇甘如飴 The emperor said, "Sun, moon and stars harmonize the four seasons."...Kuo Shē-jên said, "Nibble the lips of the one surnamed Wēi; they are sweet as honey-cake."

This is an example of how the ability to recognize puns can help make sense of a cryptic text. (If you read characters instead of language, this door is closed to you. Move on.) Five of the seven syllables in the line ascribed to 郭舍人 show phonetic similarity to the corresponding syllable in that ascribed to the emperor.

ngwāt - p'wār
sieng - ~~njō~~ niag djān - d'jwən ~~g'wā~~ g'āb - kām siət - ~~njō~~ ziaq
djag - diag

If you wonder why only five instead of all seven, you think like me. My guess is that a copyist substituted a general term "wife-woman" for the name of a specific one. Whose lip might an emperor have nibbled? (The reply, "Anyone's he pleased," while technically accurate, is not proper in this context.) Consorts of 武帝 were known by their family name preposed to the term 夫人 "imperial consort." In 128 BC 衛夫人 gave birth to a son of 武帝 and was elevated to the status of empress. If we assume the two syllables 月星 are punned with 衛姓:

ngüwat - [p'war →] giwäd
sieng - [m'io niag →] siëng

we get what I suggest the author of this squib originally wrote. As Bodman said of the puns in the 釋名, these show surprisingly archaic features. Perhaps the author spoke with a regional accent instead of the koiné the emperor would have used, or maybe he thought 郭舍人 did.

What this tells us about how casually a copyist might alter a text must be borne in mind whenever we read CC. We are not entitled to assume that old copies recently unearthed had never been subject to similar alteration before they were buried.

k'ak 400 day by clepsydra ("a notch") 刻

隋：昔黃帝創觀漏水制器取則以分晝夜其後因以命官周禮挈壺氏則其職也其法總以百刻分子晝夜冬至晝漏四十刻夜漏六十刻夏至晝漏六十刻夜漏四十刻春秋二分晝夜各五十刻日未出前二刻半而明既沒後二刻半乃昏滅夜五刻以晝晝漏謂之昏旦 In antiquity, Huang Ti initiated the observing of draining water. He specified apparatus for obtaining a standard, and by that he divided the day and the night. His successors went on to use it to give orders to offices. This is precisely the duty of the clepsydra-fillers in the Chou Li. The method: divide a total of one hundred notches between day and night. At the winter solstice forty notches drain during day and sixty during night. At the summer solstice sixty notches drain during day and forty during night. At the equinoxes each get fifty notches. Two and a half notches before the sun rises, it gets light. Two and a half notches after the sun sets, it gets dark. When we take five notches from the night and add them to the day we call that morning and evening twilight.

隋：冬夏至之間晝夜長短凡差二十刻每差一刻爲一箭冬至互起其首凡有四十箭 Between the winter and summer solstices, the day and night grow and shrink, the total difference being twenty notches. Each occasion on which it differs by one notch constitutes one arrow. At the winter solstice it crosses itself and begins again from its head, making altogether 41 arrows.

衡：皆在徙倚漏刻之間未必宿日有其思也 It is always within a few minutes; it is not that they necessarily have plans for it days in advance.

隋：作馬上漏刻以從行辨時刻 He made a horseback clepsydra, to accompany travel and tell time by notches.

隋：春秋分之日正出在卯在酉而晝漏五十刻即天蓋轉夜當倍晝今夜亦五十刻何也 At the spring and fall equinoxes, the sun emerges exactly at mao and enters at you, and the day measures fifty notches on the clepsydra. Now if sky turns like a parasol, the night ought to be double the day, but in fact it is also fifty notches. Why is that?

Eliminating deceit in responding to outsiders, we call that integrity. Having a firm attitude in one's dealings, we call that reliability. Now our ruler is doing to others things he dislikes for himself; deceit is not cleared away. He is destroying relatives for a bribe; his attitude is not firm. A state cannot rest on anything but integrity and cannot be stable by anything but honesty. Having violated integrity and honesty in dealing with foreign invaders, the invaders will recognize his vulnerability and turn their plans to him. Having pulled up his root, how can he last long?

k'jəd 3.8 ^{mp} surname 乞
k'jəd 3.8 vapor, mass-energy 68 氣 曠 炁 气
 The stuff by which things move. It is invisible (except when we see it), intangible (except when we feel it), inchoate (except when it coalesces). All living things contain it; some also breathe it in and out. There are distinct sorts of it according with the Yin, Yang and five elements, but it's all the same stuff. Altogether a much less satisfactory concept than phlogiston, which at least turned out to be scientifically refutable; but by the same token, much handier for off-the-cuff explanations of how things work. I like Creel's suggestion that the concept may have originated in the observation that the lid of a boiling pot is moved by the escaping water vapor. It may be more than coincidence that the word is a near-homonym of k'jəd 器 "vessel." (= set 250?)
 In philosophy 氣, even more so than 德, is a concept hard to explain in terms of western cosmology;

the world-view it presupposes cannot be made to fit with western models dating from Aristotle and earlier.
 The western view sees matter and motion and suggests some relation between them. The modern concept of energy dates from the enlightenment, but related concepts like "quantity of motion" are found earlier. Both concepts, matter and energy, are subsumed by 氣, but not in a way that makes it possible to draw any equivalence. The western model not only allows but requires quantitative measurement of mass and energy. The Chinese model allows measurement of weight, which can stand in as a substitute for mass. It allows measurement of length and time, whose ratio is speed. Thus components of a formula for quantifying energy are present; what is lacking is the very concept of quantifiable energy.

Once upon a time, at the beginning of the universe, 氣 was all identical. It was called the big blob 太一.
 For no reason at all, or at least none I have ever seen mentioned, it separated into distinct lumps; as separation proceeded these lumps turned out to be the distinct physical objects we see around us now. The word for these is 物. We think of 物 as lumps of matter which move by exchanging energy among themselves, both matter and energy being quantitatively measurable. In the Chinese model, they are lumps of 氣, which move because 氣 moves. No technical terms for mass or energy exist, as none are needed in this model. (This is why I consider "five phases" to be as much a mistranslation of 五行 as "five elements". Things like 木 and 土 are not matter, nor are they energy; they are 氣, and as such they move 行 according to their own natures.)
 In common parlance when mass or energy is an important feature of a description, "weight" 重 and "substance" 質 and "volume" 容 or 實 can all refer to mass. Potential energy is ascribed to the relative position 勢 of things, while kinetic energy is not distinguished from speed 速, which is in turn only vaguely distinguished from acceleration 疾 or 激.

 energy, sometimes gas and sometimes air. I have found other ad hoc renderings needed as well. But to grasp the concept we must bear in mind that 氣 is the basic stuff of the universe. There are a small number of pure types of it, lumps of which interact by resonance just as do the strings of musical instruments. Oil and horses and clouds and all things are composed of blends of these few types, differing proportions accounting for their differing behavior—but we cannot measure such proportions; we can only infer them from the things' behavior.

 釋: 氣饑也饑然有聲而無形也 k'jəd "energy-vapor" is χjəd "breath"; breathlike it has sound but no shape.

 trouble himself about it.

ple are conceived, those who are destined to become rich and high-ranking initially are provided with the stuff that makes it so all by itself.

淮: 鴈順風以愛氣力 Wild geese fly downwind so as to conserve energy.

淮: 賤長貴壯俗尚氣力 They disdain elders and honor the vigorous. Their customs favor those of high energy.

漢: 軍旅之後必有凶年言民之各以其愁苦 之氣薄陰陽之和感天地之精而災氣為之生 也 After a military expedition the harvest will surely fail. That says each of the folk attenuates the harmony of Yin and Yang by the energy-vapor of his sorrow and bitterness, resonating with the generative power of sky and earth, and destructive energy-vapor arises on account of that.

淮: 日月不應非其氣君子不容非其類也 The sun

The Kuo were ancient nobility. They loved the good but were unable to make use of them; they hated the evil but were unable to get rid of them. Thus the good resented them while the evil defied them. Therefore they were destroyed, becoming a graveyard." Nowadays a place, whether high or low, where old dwellings are exposed is called k'iwā.

Chuang Chou laughed and said to the messenger, "A thousand ducats are a handsome sum and premier is an honored office. Have you never noticed the sacrificial ox at the temple in the suburb? They feed and care for it for years and dress it in patterned brocade to be led into the great temple. At that point, even if it wished it could have been a mere pig left out to forage for itself, do you think it would have a chance of that? Begone at once, sir! Do not insult me!"

衡：魯公牛哀病化爲虎搏食其兄同 Kung-niu Ai of Lu had a malady that changed him into a tiger, and he mauled and ate his elder brother.

衡：變復之家謂虎食人者功曹爲奸所致也其意以爲功曹衆吏之率虎亦諸禽之雄也功曹爲奸采漁於吏故虎食人以象其意 The experts in heteromancy say that when tigers eat people it has been brought about by the province executive acting corruptly. The idea is that the province executive is the leader of all the officers and the tiger is the most dominant of all critters. When the province executive behaves corruptly and takes graft from the officers, then tigers eat people as a metaphor for that idea.

衡：夫虎食人人亦有殺虎謂虎食人功曹受取於吏如人食虎吏受於功曹也乎案世清廉之士百不能一居功曹之官皆有奸心私舊故可以幸苞苴賂遺小大皆有必謂虎應功曹是野中之虎常害人也 People also sometimes kill tigers. If we say that when tigers eat people it means the province executive is taking graft from the officers, when people eat tigers does it mean that the officers are taking graft from the province executive? Noting that in our time those of the official class who are incorruptible cannot even be one percent, regardless of who is in the office of province executive he will have a mind to corruption and will favor his cronies; thus he will receive presents and bribes. If great and small all insist on claiming that tigers act in response to province executives that would mean that tigers in the wild are constantly attacking people.

衡：夫虎出有時猶龍見有期也陰物以冬見陽虫以夏出出應其氣氣動其類參伐以冬出心尾以夏見參伐則虎星心尾則龍象象出而物見氣至而類動天地之性也動於林澤之中遭虎搏噬之時稟性狂勃貪明飢餓觸自來之人安能不食人之筋力羸弱不適巧便不知故遇輒死使孟賁登山馮婦入林亦無此害也 Now, tigers appear at certain times, just as there are particular occasions for dragons to appear. Yin things appear in winter and Yang creatures come out in summer. They emerge in response to the energy-vapor and the vapor moves all their kind. The constellations Shên and Fa come out in winter while Hsin and Wei appear in summer. Constellations Shên and Fa are in the tiger while Hsin and Wei are part of the dragon image. When the image comes out the things appear; when the vapor arrives the class of things becomes active. That is the life-process of sky and earth. On occasions when one who is busy in the forests and marshes and encounters a tiger is caught and eaten by it, the tiger, with its natural fierceness and rapacity, being hungry and suddenly encountering a human who has come along of his own accord, could hardly refrain from eating him. Men's muscles are soft and weak, no match for a tiger's, nor their cunning up to its. Thus they encounter sudden death. But let Mêng Pên climb a mountain or P'ing Fu go into the forest and this calamity would not occur.

forest in Lu there was a woman crying bitterly. Confucius sent Tzù Kung to ask why; she told him, "Last year a tiger ate my husband. This year one ate my son; that is why I cry so bitterly." Tzù Kung said, "Then why don't you move away from here?" She replied, "I like the way the government here doesn't harass people and the officials are not violent men." Tzù Kung went back and told Confucius, who said, "Do you see the point, students? A meddling government and violent officials are worse than tigers." Now as to tigers eating people, it certainly happened in former times. But if a government does not harass and officials are not violent, its righteous influence ought to be able to keep off tigers, and yet here two men were eaten by tigers in two consecutive years. It is because wild beasts in the forest do not respond to good deeds. If practising integrity gets no response from them, then treacherous officials will have no response either.

衡：或曰虎應功曹之奸所謂不苛政者非功曹也婦人廉吏之部也雖有善政安耐化虎夫魯無功曹之官功曹之官相國是也魯相者殆非孔墨必三家也為相必無賢操以不賢居權位其惡必不廉也必以相國為奸今虎食人是則魯野之虎常食人也 One may object, "The tigers respond to the treachery of the province executive, and what is described here as being a government that does not harass and officials who are not violent is not due to the province executive. The woman lived in a department with integritous officials." But even if there was a good government, how could it affect the tigers? Now Lu had no office of province executive. The office there that corresponded to province executive would have been prime minister. The prime ministers of Lu were generally not of the caliber of Confucius and Mohtzu; they were typically members of the three families. As prime minister they never did anything right. With such incompetence in such a powerful position, it is certain that they were evil men with no integrity at all. If we insist that their subverting the office of prime minister to their own benefit caused tigers to eat people then tigers must always have been eating people in the countryside of Lu.

衡：水中之毒不及陵上陵上之氣不入水中各以所近罹殃取禍是故漁者不死於山獵者不溺於淵好入山林窮幽測深涉虎窟寢虎搏噬之何以為變魯公牛哀病化為虎搏食其兄同變化者不以為怪入山林草澤見害於虎怪之非也 Poison in a river does not affect a mountain top, nor does the vapor of mountain tops get into rivers. We always stumble into harm and hurt from what we are near to. Thus fishermen never fall off mountains, nor do hunters drown in pools. If you like to go into mountain forests, penetrating to the very depths and exploring the darkest corners and you pass a tiger's lair and a tiger lying there attacks you and eats you, what is there to be surprised about? Kung-niu Ai of Lu contracted a malady that turned him into a tiger; he attacked and ate his elder brother and the heteromancers do not think it odd. If people go into mountains and forests and weeds and swamps and are harmed by tigers, it is wrong to consider it odd. 衡：蝮蛇猛亦能害入行止澤中於蝮蛇應

何官吏蜂蠆害人入毒氣害人入水火害人入為蜂蠆所螫為毒氣所中為火所燔為水所溺又誰致之者苟諸禽獸乃應吏政行山林中麋鹿野豬牛象熊羆豺狼蠅皆復殺人苟謂食人乃應為變虱聞虻皆食人身強大故不至死倉卒之世[谷一]穀食之貴百姓飢餓自相啖食厥變甚於虎變復之家不處苛政 Vipers are fierce and wild and can hurt people, too. If one is traveling and halts in a swamp and is struck by a viper, to which official is it responding? Wasps and scorpions can hurt people; ingesting noxious vapor can hurt people; entering water or fire can hurt people. If people are stung by wasps or scorpions, or are struck by noxious vapor, or are burned by fire or drowned by water, who brought that about? Let us arbitrarily claim that all wild animals simply respond to the government of the officials. In the mountains and forests, deer, wild pigs, buffaloes, elephants, bears, wolves and apes all sometimes kill people. Let us arbitrarily claim that eating people is simply an induced distortion of nature. Fleas, lice, mosquitoes and gnats all eat people; people being much bigger and stronger, death does not ensue. In a time of emergency, when grain prices are exorbitant and citizens are starving, they may devour each other, a distortion considerably more serious than any occasioned by tigers. The experts in heteromancy do not ascribe this to a harassing government.

衡：且虎所食非獨人也含血之禽有形之獸虎皆食之人謂應功曹之奸食他禽獸應何官吏夫虎毛虫裸虫毛虫飢食裸虫何變之有四夷之外大人食小人虎之與蠻夷氣性一也 Furthermore, it is not the case that tigers eat only people. Any creature that has flesh and blood, a tiger will eat it. If eating people is, as people say, in response to the corruption of the province executive, in response to what officer do they eat other animals? Now tigers are of the hairy class of animals while people are of the smooth-skinned class. If a hairy animal gets hungry and eats a smooth animal, what is anomalous in that? Beyond the frontier tribes, adults eat children; tigers share the same natural impulses as barbarians. 衡：平陸廣都虎所不由也山林草澤虎所生出也必以虎食人應功曹之奸是則平陸廣都之縣功曹常為賢山林草澤之邑功曹常伏[誅一]鉢也夫虎食人於野應功曹之奸虎時入邑行於民間功曹遊於閭巷之中乎實說虎害人於野不應政其行都邑乃為怪夫虎山林之獸不狎之物也常在草野之中不為馴畜猶人家之有鼠也伏匿出非非常見也 Leveled land and broad cities are not where tigers come from; tigers emerge from mountains, forests, weeds and swamps. If you insist on the assumption that tigers eat people in response to the corruption of the province executive, then in counties where there is leveled land and broad cities, the province executives must always be good men, while in cities located among mountains, forests, weeds and swamps, the province executive must always be getting punished. Now if a tiger eating someone out in the wilds is a response to the corruption of the province executive, when on occasion a tiger enters a city and goes about among the folk there, does that mean the province executive has been roaming about the back alleys? If the real explanation for tigers eating people in the wilds is not that they are responding to the government, then the occasions when they traverse cities and towns are to be wondered at. Tigers are creatures of the mountain and forest, not domestic creatures. They normally live among uncultivated wilds and are not tamed and domesticated. It is like human habitations having rats; they lie low and hide and rarely come out, and are not ordinarily to be seen.

xiéngnu ^{mp} ko C. Asian tribesmen 匈 奴

新：匈奴控弦大率六萬騎五口而出介卒一人五六三十此即戶口三十萬耳未及漢千石大縣也 Hsiung-nu archers number at a rough estimate sixty thousand horsemen. One out of five of the population can become a warrior; five sixes are thirty; this means that their population is only 300,000. It is not up to that of a large shire of one thousand dia in Han.

漢：丁令比三歲入盜匈奴 Tingling raided the territory of the Hsiungnu in three consecutive years.

後：自是匈奴衰弱邊無寇警鮮卑烏桓並入朝

貢 From then on the Hsiung-nu became weaker and there were no more alarms of incursions. The Hsienpei and the Wu-huan both sent tribute to the court.

On strategy and tactics of fighting Hsiung-nu:
漢：莽將嚴尤諫曰臣聞匈奴為害所從來久矣未聞上世有必征之者也 [Wang] Mang's general Yen Yu protested, "I have heard that the Hsiung-nu have been doing harm for a very long time. I have never heard of anyone in high antiquity who felt it necessary to bring them under control.
漢：後世三家周秦漢征之然皆未有得上策者也周得中策漢得下策秦無策焉 Later the three houses of Chou, Ch'in and Han tried to bring them under control, but none of them has devised the best strategy. Chou devised a mediocre strategy, Han an inferior strategy, and Ch'in had no strategy at all with regard to them.

漢：當周宣王時獫狁內侵至于涇陽命將征之盡境而還其視戎狄之侵譬猶蚊虻之螫蝕之而已故天下稱明是為中策 At the time of the Perspicuous King of Chou, the Hsien-yun invaded as far as Ching-yang. He ordered his generals to bring them under control. They went all the way to the border and turned back. Their view of barbarian incursions was to compare them to bites of mosquitoes or flies: just drive them away, that's all. Thus everyone said they were smart. This is a mediocre strategy.

漢：漢武帝選將練兵約齋糧深入遠戍雖有克獲之功胡輒報之兵連禍結三十餘年中國罷耗匈奴亦創艾而天下稱武是為下策 The Martial Emperor of Han sent hand-picked generals and crack troops, lightly equipped and with slender rations, invading deeply, far beyond the border regions [V. poem & note under 霍去病]. Though he did accomplish much in the way of winning battles and taking captives, the Hsiung-nu retaliated immediately. War continued and disaster went on for more than thirty years. China was exhausted and impoverished, and the Hsiung-nu also took heavy casualties. Everyone said he was militant. This is an inferior strategy.

漢：秦始皇不忍小恥而輕民力築長城之固延袤萬里轉輸之行起於負海 The First Emperor of Ch'in would not tolerate minor slights and cared little for the people's exertions. He had the fastness of the long wall built, extending on and on for ten thousand li. The supply road along it began at the eastern seashore.

漢：疆境既完中國內竭以喪社稷是為無策 When this boundary had been completed, China was used up, and thus his dynasty ended. This is to have no strategy.

漢：今天下遭陽九之厄比年饑饉西北邊尤甚 Now the world feels the pinch of yang building up; we have had hunger and famine for consecutive years. It is especially severe at the northwest frontier.

漢：發三十萬眾具三百日糧東援海代南取江淮然後乃備 To send out 300,000 men and assemble three hundred days' rations could only be fully done by taking from as far as the sea and the province of Tai on the east and as far as the Yangtze and the Huai on the south.

漢：計其道里一年尚未集合兵先至者 [聚→] 聖居暴露師老械弊勢不可用此一難也 Reckoning how to do it, after a year we still won't have got it together. The first units to arrive will have to camp out while building cantonments. The troops will be tired and their equipment worn out, not employable as a force. This is the first difficulty.

漢：邊既空虛不能奉軍糧內調郡國不相及屬此二難也 The frontierlands being uninhabited, they cannot supply food to the army. If it is requisitioned from the interior, no province is very near them. This is the second difficulty.

漢：計一人三百日食用糶十八斛非牛力不能勝牛又當自齋食加二十斛重矣胡地沙鹵多乏水草以往事揆之軍出未滿百日牛必物故且盡餘糧尚多人不能負此三難也 Calculating one man's food for three hundred days, that will take 18 hu of dried rice. Nothing but oxen can haul that load. The oxen will also have to transport their own fodder. When we add 20 hu, it's gotten heavy. The sand and salt lands of the barbarians are mostly deficient in water and grass. Measuring by what has already happened, before the army is a hundred days out the oxen will be physically used up to the point of exhaustion, but there will still be a lot of food supplies which cannot be ported by men. This is the third difficulty.

漢：多齋釜鍍薪炭重不可勝食精飲水以歷四時師有疾疫之憂是故前世伐胡不過百日非不欲久勢力不能此四難也 If we tried to provide a lot of pots and pans and firewood and charcoal it would be too heavy to carry. If they eat only dried rice and drink water, passing four seasons in that manner would lead to pestilence among the expedition. That is why when our forerunners attacked Central Asia, it was never for more than a hundred days. It wasn't that they didn't want to go on longer, it was that their strength wasn't up to it in that situation. That is the fourth difficulty.

漢：輜重自隨則輕銳者少不得疾行虜徐遁逃勢不能及幸而逢虜又累輜重如遇險阻銜尾相隨虜要遮前後危殆不測此五難也 If our baggage train accompanies us then our mobility will be reduced and we won't be able to travel fast. The tribesmen can retreat at their leisure and our situation will prevent us from catching them. If we should happen to run into them we will still be encumbered by our baggage train [累 put caus fac]. If we encounter a defile, going through single file, nose to tail, they will strike our front and rear in the constriction, putting us in no end of danger. That is difficulty number five.

漢：大用民力功不可必立臣伏憂之今既發兵宜縱先至者令臣尤等深入霆擊且以創艾胡虜 To expend much of the people's strength when success cannot be assured—I humbly object to that. Since arms have already been issued, it would be best to let the first to reach the enemy keep going, letting me and others go deep and strike a lightning blow aiming to inflict heavy casualties on the barbarians. 𠄎𠄎𠄎 𠄎𠄎𠄎 warmth, being warned 365 煦嫗

This poem is an example of how sinologists get the impression that CC has no grammar, is not a language, and can be understood from the meanings of the characters. Examined carefully, it yields a refutation of each of those mistaken notions.

Take "character meanings." In the very first line, 汗 is not "sweat." Going on, 虜 is not "prisoner," 思 is not "think" and 令 is not "order." Calling these "loan-characters" merely supplies a name; it does not explain how words can be written with characters whose meanings conflict with the meanings of the words they write.

The diction is compressed, as is well-nigh universal in Chinese poetry, but, as is also generally the case, its grammar is entirely regular. In particular, expressing time and place with a sentence-initial topic rather than a sentence-final conuclear phrase with 於 is less common in ordinary speech than in poetry, but there is nothing irregular about it. Words like 於 and 而 are seldom found in poetry, but their omission in ordinary speech is not irregular. Omission of optional elements has the effect of removing scaffolding, putting more reliance on the reader's language competence. A reader in whom that competence is deficient will have trouble.

Minimized scaffolding is evident in other aspects of this type of diction as well. The poem relates a connected, consequential narrative, but in a cinematic style that cuts from one scene to the next: wall, pass, desert, battle, flight, attrition, surrender, rewards, glory. To one who is not familiar with this expedition and its results (ie who has not studied the dynastic histories) the poem can seem a random grouping of champs of unrelated words. That effect is intensified by the heavy use of allusion.

Technical terms (eg 斥候) give little trouble if they are not also common words; it is obvious at first sight that they need to be looked up. Where that is not the case (eg 魚麗) they can tempt a reader to indulge imagination, the result of which can never be anything but deplorable. Allusion carries that temptation to a higher magnitude.

"Pirate bats faltered after the sultan swatted the sixtieth," alludes to one event in history, the 1927 World Series. If you don't know baseball it is gibberish—but grammatical gibberish. "Faltered" and "swatted" are clearly verbs because of their affixes. In CC, denied such clues, we must not only look up words, we must also look for more examples of their use. To those who rely on "knowing characters" a poem like this one inspires no delight of recognition or joy at felicitous expression. It occasions only an agony of cogitation as to why one might embrace a flag or why clouds pile up on seven weary soldiers.

Thus what appears to be a paradox: those who don't know the language deny that it is a language, and so bar themselves from learning it, while those who do know it see it clearly for what it is. It would have made no difference to the poet's contemporaries whether this poem was spoken or written: with or without characters, it would have been clear to the well-educated, obscure to the rest. For example, to one who knows that the Ch'iang were ethnically similar to the Hsiung-nu but were allied with the Han Chinese against them in this war, the line about flute sounds is not mere local color but a fine use of metonymy to depict nomad cavalry asking whether they will be treated decently if they surrender, and others of their kind assuring them that they will. Shakespeare is full of such lines, but no one suggests that his English was not a spoken language.

As for the celebration of 霍去病's victories, 嚴尤 took a different view, as reported in 漢書. 漢：漢武帝選將練兵約齋輕糧深入遠戍雖有克獲之功胡輒報之兵連禍結三十餘年中國罷耗匈奴亦創艾而天下稱武是爲下策 The Martial Emperor of Han sent hand-picked generals and crack troops, lightly equipped and with slender rations, invading deeply, far beyond the border regions. Although he did accomplish much in the way of winning battles and taking captives, the Hsiung-nu retaliated immediately. War continued and disaster went on for more than thirty years. China was exhausted and impoverished, and the Hsiung-nu also took heavy casualties. Everyone said he was militant. This is an inferior strategy.

後：獻樂及幻人能變化吐火自支解易牛馬頭 They presented musicians and an illusionist; he could transform himself, spit fire, dismember himself, exchange cows' and horses' heads.

呂：平地注水水流溼均薪施火火就燥 Pour water on level ground and it flows toward wetness; light firewood of equal size and it burns toward dryness.

隋：今日西轉不復見是火滅之類也日月不圓也望視之所以圓者去人遠也夫日火之精也月水之精也水火在地不圓在天何故圓 In fact, how the sun rolls westward and is no longer seen is exactly analogous to a fire going out. It is not true that the sun and moon are round. That they appear round when we look at them is because they are so far away from us. The sun is the essence of fire, the moon that of water. Water and fire are not round on the ground; why should they be round in the sky?

(2). fire made for cooking, heating or lighting

左：飲桓公酒樂公曰以火鑪之辭曰臣卜其晝未卜其夜不敢 They gave a drinking party for the Foursquare ruler and it was a good one. The marquess said, "Let's carry on by firelight." He would not, saying "YS has divined about the daytime, but not about the night. I dare not."

衡：謂人死有知是謂火滅復有光也 To claim that people have consciousness after death is to claim, by the same token, that a fire illuminates after going out.

衡：去人不一里火滅矣 Before he has gone one li the fire has disappeared.

漢：寒民舍居橋下疑以火自燎為此災也 People who were cold had taken shelter under the bridge, and probably they used fire and it spread of its own and caused this disaster.

衡：以一斗水灌冶鑪之火氣激裂若雷之音矣 Throw a dipperful of water into the fire of a smelter and the eruption of vapor will make a p'iat-liat sound like thunder.

非：有聖人作鑿隧取火以化腥臊而民說之 There was a sage who invented the fire-drill to get fire as a means of altering the ?raw? taste, and people were pleased by that.

xwaxien nc magician 化人

列：周穆王時西極之國有化人來入水火貫金石反山川移城邑乘虛不墜觸實不礙千變萬化不可窮極既已變物之形又且易人之慮 In the time of the Splendid King of Chou there came a magician from the far west. He went into water and fire, pierced metal and stone, inverted the positions of mountain and river and shifted the positions of walled cities. He rode the void as a chariot without falling; when he hit something solid it was no obstruction to him. There was no end to his thousands of changes and myriads of alterations. Having changed the shape of things, he went on to alter the thoughts of men.

列：穆王敬之若神事之若君推路寢以居之引三牲以進之選女樂以娛之化人以爲王之宮室卑陋而不可處王之廚腥腥而不可饗王之嬪御醜惡而不可親 The Splendid King esteemed him as a spirit and served him as a master. He extended the Grand Chamber to accommodate him, had sacrificial animals brought to offer him and selected dancing girls to please him. The magician thought the king's palaces too crude and vulgar to live in, the products of his kitchen too putrid and maggoty to feast on and his hours and serving-wenches so smelly and ugly he couldn't bear to get near them.

列：穆王乃爲之改築土木之功積室之色無遺巧焉五府爲虛而臺始成其高千仞臨終南之上號曰中天之臺 The Splendid King thereupon rebuilt just for him. No detail of finesse was omitted in its foundation, timbers or red-ochre plastering. The five treasuries were bankrupted before the tower was finished. Its height was a thousand jên, it looked down on Farsouth Mountain and it was called, "Tower that pierced the sky".

列：簡鄭衛之處子娥媼靡曼者施芳澤正娥眉設笄珥衣阿錫曳齊紈粉白黛黑珮玉環 He chose the most elegant and slender of the maidens of Chêng and Wèi and had them anointed with perfumed oils, their eyebrows plucked, provided with hairpins and earrings, clothed with gauze of Ah and cloaked with silk of Ch'i, faces whitened with powder and eyebrows darkened with eyebrow pencil, and given jade rings to wear at their sashes.

列：雜芷若以滿之奏承雲六瑩九韶晨露以樂之月月獻玉衣旦且薦玉食化人猶不舍然不得已而臨之 He had the tower filled with a mixture of angelica and ginger lily. He had music played for him such as Gathering clouds, Six gems, Collected Shao and Pre-dawn dew. Month after month he provided costly raiment; morning after morning he presented exquisite delicacies. The magician was still not quite satisfied but for lack of anything better he condescended to accept it.

列：居亡幾何謂王同游王執化人之祛騰而上者中天迺止暨及化人之宮化人之宮構以金銀絡以珠玉出雲雨之上而不知下之據望之若屯雲焉 Not long afterward he told the king that they should share a journey. The king grasped the magician's sleeve and their ascent did not stop until they had pierced the sky. They arrived at the magician's palace together. The magician's palace was woven of gold and silver and tied with pearls and jade. It projected higher than clouds and rain. He could not tell what was beneath it that it rested on; when he looked for it it was like piled-up clouds.

列：耳目所觀聽鼻口所納嘗皆非人間之有王實以爲清都紫微鈞天廣樂帝之所居王俯而視之其宮榭若累塊積蘇焉王自以[爲]居數十年不思其國也 Whatever he looked at or listened to, whatever he smelled or tasted, none of it found any counterpart in the world of humankind. To the king it seemed genuinely to be Clear Capital, Purple Mystery, Balance-sky, All-delights, places where the Ancestor might dwell. When the king looked down at them his halls and towers looked like piles of dirt and sheaves of grain. It seemed to the king that he dwelled there for decades; not did he ever think of his own kingdom.

列：化人復謁王同游所及之處仰不見日月俯不見河海光影所照王目眩不能得視音響所來王耳亂不能得聽百骸六藏悸而不凝意迷精喪請化人求還化人移之王若殞虛焉 The magician again told the king they would share a journey. At the place they reached, looking up he could not see sun or moon; looking down he could not see the Yellow River or the sea. Wherever the lights and reflections illuminated, the king's eyes were dazzled and he could not make out a thing. Wherever sound and echo came from, the king's ears were befuddled and could not sort them out. His very bones and innards quaked and would not subside. The king had no idea where he was and his morale plummeted; he begged the magician to let him go home. The magician transported him; to the king it felt like falling through emptiness.

列：既寤所坐猶嚮者之處侍御猶嚮者之人視其前則酒未[清→]清肴未[拂→]拂王問所從來左右曰王默存耳由此穆王自失者三月而復 When he returned to consciousness the place he was sitting seemed the same as a while ago and the servants and attendants still the same ones. Looking at what was before him, he saw that the wine was still warm and the meat still moist. The king asked where he had come from. His servants said, "YM has only been sitting still." From then on the Splendid King was distracted; it was three months before he recovered.

列：更問化人化人曰吾與王神遊也形奚動哉且曩之所居奚異王之宮曩之所游奚異王之圃王問恆有疑慙亡變化之極徐疾之間可盡模哉 He resumed his inquiries of the magician. The magician said, "YM and I took a magical journey; why should our bodies have moved? And why should where we sat then be other than YM's palace? And why should where we strolled then be other than YM's garden? YM is at ease with what is permanent but suspicious of what is transient. But how could the entire range of changes, slow or fast as they may be between one extreme and the other, be conformable to some standard?"

列：王大悅不恤國事不樂臣妾肆意遠游 The king was enormously gratified. He did not trouble himself about affairs of state, nor disport himself with his retainers, men or women; he allowed his entire attention to be focused on distant journeys.

藝：後單于遣使者朝賀元帝陳設倡樂乃令後宮粧出昭君怨恚日久乃便循飾善粧盛服 Later the Shan-yü sent an emissary to pay a court visit to the Reinigorating Emperor, who put on a display of his entertainers and musicians. Then he had the ladies of his harem come out in makeup. Chao-chün resented that it had taken so long a time. So only then did she proceed to beautify herself. She put on her makeup with the greatest skill and dressed to the nines.

藝：元帝謂使者曰單于何所願樂對曰珍奇怪物皆悉自備唯婦人醜陋不如中國 The Reinigorating Emperor asked the emissary, "What would the Shan-yü like to make him happy?" The emissary replied, "He has all the rareties and curios he wants. It is only his wives who are ugly and dowdy, not like Chinese."

藝：乃令後宮欲至單于者起昭君喟然越席而前曰妾幸得備在後宮羸醜卑陋不合陛下之心誠願得行帝大驚悔之良久太息曰朕已誤矣遂以與之 So he ordered any of the women who wanted to go to the Shan-yü to stand up. With a gasp, Chao-chün crossed the mats and came forward. She said, "Your servant has been fortunate to be among the complement of the harem. Coarse, ugly, lowly and crude, I did not meet YM's requirements. I genuinely want to be allowed to go." The emperor was gobsmacked. He sat there a long time, regretting what he had done. With a loud sigh, he said, "How utterly mistaken I have been!" Then he consigned her to the emissary.

The way he governed Ch'in, the laws were enforced to the letter, he was open and even-handed and impartial, he did not shy from punishing the mighty and great, nor did he favor his own party in giving rewards. The law extended even to the heir-apparent, whose tutor was tattooed and disowned. After a year of that, things lost on the road were not picked up, people didn't take what wasn't theirs, the army was strong both on offense and defense and the barons were all afraid. But he cut deep with little mercy. He only subdued them by force, that is all. [1st 2 不 prob sub-syl] [The sing-song rhythm of this excerpt is in notable contrast to the flowing narrative style of most of the 戰國策 (and of the 韓非子, a closely related text in many ways). It seems more like a series of jingles meant for memorization. In that respect it reads more like a self-consciously literary text such as the 漢書. See discussion under 說.]

king of Ch'u, "When the five nations have been its instrument of smashing Chǐ, Chǐn is sure to turn its attention south to Ch'ü." When the king asked what to do about it, he replied, "The Hán family grip the state; they are self-aggrandizing but wary of conflict. That means they can be corralled by greed and controlled by fear. If we offer them a huge bribe so as to fill their minds with thoughts of what they stand to gain we will certainly rein them in, and if we then overawe them with the full extent of our military might they will surely be afraid of us. With them afraid of our might and governed by our wealth, anything the alliance of five do can be brought to nothing. And after they have broken the treaty, we need not even cede them any land." The king approved and sent Ta Kung as envoy to Hán. He met with Kung-chung and said, "The business at Niu-lan and the trouble at Ma-ling are things your king himself has seen. If the king would refrain from taking any military action on account of the alliance of five, we would like to cede certain territory of ours to you, to wit five cities, and we would also like to mobilize our full power in defense of Ch'ü." After Ch'ü had repulsed Chao and Wei, Ch'ü did not cede the territory after all; thus was the alliance of five confounded.

Above, mist and dew could not get in. The four winds could not invade it. The earthenwork was not patterned nor was the timbering carved. The bronze vessels had no engraving. The garments had no distinctive tailoring; the caps had no melon-patterning. The hall was large enough to permit the explication of civilization by circular procession. The cleanliness of it sufficed to entertain an emperor and do honor to the spirits of the dead, so as to show the folk that they knew how to be frugal and abstemious.

It can be convenient to translate this verb plus its object into English with a form of the verb “to be” plus a predicate nominative. Resist the temptation to think of this verb as meaning “to be.” The timeless sense of identification of “to be” is expressed in CC by the appositional sentence, [A] B 也. The contrast between 人也 and 為人 is that the first implies no action, while the second implies acts or treatment associated with being a human. This contrast for a proper noun is instructive: 鳥獲也 "He was Wu Huo," can be said of only one man in history, whereas 爲鳥獲 "He was a Wu Huo," can be said of anyone who performs his feats of strength. The contrast shows in the "Butterfly Dream" of Chuangtzu: 昔者莊周夢爲胡蝶栩栩然胡蝶也 "Once upon a time Chuang Chou dreamed he turned into a butterfly. He was happy being a butterfly." Cf also the use of a noun as nucleus or nuclear adjunct, meaning to act in the manner we associate with that noun. Thus the nuclear sentence 犬 "Dogs acted like people," would mean that a dog stood on its hind legs or ate with its paws or did something manlike actv doglike. The nuclear sentence 犬爲人 "Dogs became people," might mean that through some uncanny metamorphosis dogs turned into humans, or it might mean that e.g. through a change in the laws, dogs acquired the status of humans. The oppositional sentence 犬人也 "Dogs are people," expresses an identification that, outside some explanatory context, is simply false. One such context is the use of the oppositional sentence to express equivalence in drawing an analogy (see under dīa 也, A.2.b).

A. in absolute use, act, contrive

淮：無鄉之社易為黍肉 A land-altar with no village is easy to make sacrificial meals for. [v. next wd]

a. The folg example looks superficially like the object-erogating function of 難 and 易 in the dual-object construction with 為, but is better viewed as parallel to the use of 寧 “find preferable”.

漢：古世相革皆承聖王之烈今漢獨收孤秦之弊鑄金石者難為功摧枯朽者易為力其勢然也 In replacing each other, the ancient successor dynasties all received the power of the sage kings. Only Han acceded to the inanity of the isolated Ch'in. Carving metal and stone we find it hard to make a good job of it; breaking withered, rotten twigs we find it easy to exert the strength. That is due to the circumstances of these cases. [If we take these two sentences as context seems to require, in their transformational sources 為 has no indir obj to be erogated by 難 or 易. These two stative verbs must be functioning as factor, “find it hard/easy to.”] compare:

漢：幸而不死不可為人 If they have the good fortune not to die, they no longer find it possible to function as humans.

4. w/opt indir obj, a type of passive constr

b. indir obj may be l-shifted (v. of iwat B.5)

史：齊人聞而懼曰孔子為政必霸霸則吾地近焉我之為先并矣 The Ch'i men heard of it and became afraid; they said, “If Confucius runs the government they will become overlord. If they become overlord, then, our territory being closest to them, we are the ones who will first be engulfed by them.”

[Tangled syntax like this is among the evidence that convinces me that 司馬遷 was writing a spoken language. What he meant to say is quite clear, and it is clear why he puts that 我 out in front, but if we untangle the syntax we find that the underlying sentence says they will be engulfed by us. Malapropism of that sort, grounded in many well-known linguistic phenomena, can be heard in natural unelicited speech in every language every day. For example, English-speakers not accustomed to use the obsolescent word whom may confuse subject with object in clauses, yielding locutions like, “I will repay whomever did this.” This similar error of 司馬遷 is evidence that left-shifting with deixis was already obsolescent in spoken CC by his time. But he could also conform to older usage, as witness the folg citation]

史：難為淺見寡聞道 It is not easily understood by shallow and slight knowledge.]

戰: 韓且坐而胥亡乎 Is Hán going to sit and wait to be destroyed?

史: 秦之所害於天下者莫如趙然而秦不敢舉兵伐趙者何也畏韓魏之[議→]儀其後也 Ch'in regards none in the world as more harmful than Chao, but Ch'in does not dare raise a force and attack Chao. Why? They fear that Hán and Wei would take aim at their rear.

戰: 五國約以伐齊昭陽謂楚王曰五國以破齊秦必南圖楚王曰然則奈何對曰韓氏輔國也好利而惡難好利可營也惡難可懼也我厚賂之以利其心必營我悉兵以臨之其心必懼我彼懼吾兵而營我利五國之事必可敗也約絕之後雖勿與地可楚王曰善乃命大公[事→]使韓見公仲曰夫牛闌之事馬陵之難親王之所見也王苟無以五國用兵請效列城五請悉楚國之眾也以廣於齊齊之反趙魏之後而楚果弗與地則五國之事困也 Five nations made a treaty with Ch'in to attack Ch'i. Chao Yang said to the king of Chü, "When the five nations have been its instrument of smashing Ch'i, Ch'in is sure to turn its attention south to Chü."

When the king asked what to do about it, he replied, "The Hán family grip the state; they are self-aggrandizing but wary of conflict. That means they can be corralled by greed and controlled by fear. If we offer them a huge bribe so as to fill their minds with thoughts of what they stand to gain we will certainly rein them in, and if we then overawe them with the full extent of our military might they will surely be afraid of us. With them afraid of our might and governed by our wealth, anything the alliance of five do can be brought to nothing. And after they have broken the treaty, we need not even cede them any land." The king approved and sent Ta Kung as envoy to Hán. He met with Kung-chung and said, "The business at Niu-lan and the trouble at Ma-ling are things your king himself has seen. If the king would refrain from taking any military action on account of the alliance of five, we would like to cede certain territory of ours to you, to wit five cities, and we would also like to mobilize our full power in defense of Ch'i." After Ch'i had repulsed Chao and Wei, Chü did not cede the territory after all; thus was the alliance of five founded.

戰: 圍邯鄲八九月死傷者眾而弗下 They besieged Hantan during the eighth and ninth months; many were killed and wounded but the siege failed.

非: 邯鄲口中之虱也 Hantan would be a louse in your mouth. [ie helpless to avoid being cracked between the teeth]

史: 至於邯鄲所見者絀於所聞於東周臣竊負其志 What I saw when I reached Hantan was overborne by what I had heard in East Chou, so that I considered abandoning my intention.

戰: 邯鄲之難昭奚恤謂楚王曰王不如無救趙而以強魏強其割趙必深矣趙不能聽則必堅守是兩弊也景舍曰不然昭奚恤不知也夫魏之攻趙也恐楚之攻其後今不救趙趙有亡形而魏無楚憂是楚魏共趙也害必深矣何以兩弊也且魏令兵以深割趙趙見亡形而有楚之不救己也必與魏合而以謀楚故王不如少出兵以爲趙援趙恃楚勁必與魏戰魏怒於趙之勁而見楚救之不足畏也必不釋趙趙魏相擊而齊秦應楚則魏可破也楚因使景舍起兵救趙邯鄲拔楚取睢漳之間 At the time of the Han-tan conflict, Chao Hsi-Hsü said to the king of Ch'ü, "Best for YM not to aid Chao, thus making Wei relatively stronger. Wei being stronger will certainly cut a deep chunk of Chao territory. Chao will be unable to accept that and will resist more sturdily. This will weaken both equally." Ching She said, "Not so! Chao Hsi-Hsü doesn't know what he is talking about. Now, in Wei's attack on Chao they fear an attack in their rear by Ch'ü. In fact, if we don't aid Chao, Chao will be in a desperate position and Wei will have no threat from Ch'ü, in effect both Wei and Ch'ü ganging up on Chao. It will do them tremendous damage—how could it weaken both equally? Chao will see that they are in desperate straits and will realize that Ch'ü will not aid them, and they will have to come to some accommodation with Wei, allowing them to turn their attention to Ch'ü. Better to send a small force of assistance to Chao. Chao, relying on Chu's power, will then fight a major battle with Wei. Wei, angered by Chao's powerful response and seeing that Ch'ü's assistance is not worth bothering about, will not let Chao off lightly. With Chao and Wei weakening each other and Ch'ü and Ch'in responding to Ch'ü's initiative, Wei can be smashed. The king of Ch'ü accordingly had Ching She raise a force to aid Chao. Hantan was taken and Ch'ü took the area between the Shui and the Wai rivers.

g'antsiag 1.25 ^{np} dog name 709 韓子

g'ânpiwar 1.25 ^{np} Han Fei 韓非

衡: 韓子之術明法尚功賢無益於國不加賞不肖無害於治不施罰責功重賞責任刑用誅

The method of Mr. Han is to make the laws clear and promote those who have accomplished things. If competence has no benefit for the state, do not apply rewards to it. If klutiness does no harm to good order, do not apply punishment to it. Demand accomplishment, make its rewards massive, rely on punishment and employ the criminal law.

衡: 故其論儒也謂之不耕而食比之於一蠹論有益與無益也比之於鹿馬馬之似鹿者千金天下有千金之馬無千金之鹿鹿無益馬有用也儒者猶鹿有用之吏猶馬也 Thus when he discusses the Confucians he refers to them as eating without plowing, and compares them to one type of weevil. In discussing whether they are beneficial or worthless, he compares them to deer and horses. A horse that is like a deer is worth a thousand coins; there are thousand-coin horses but there are no thousand-coin deer, because horses are useful and deer are not. Confucians are like the deer, while useful officials are like horses.

衡: 夫韓子知以鹿馬喻不知以冠履譬使韓子不冠徒履而朝吾將聽其言也加冠於首而立於朝受無益之服增無益之[仕→]任言與服相違行與取相反吾是以非其言而不用其法也 Now Mr. Han recognizes the analogy with horses and deer but does not see the comparison with hats and shoes. If Mr. Han had gone to court wearing shoes but without putting on his hat I would be willing to consider what he says. Standing in court with a hat on his head, wearing useless clothing and adding needless encumbrance, what he says differs from what he wears; his conduct and his methods are contradictory. Therefore I reject what he says and do not adopt his precepts.

衡: 煩勞人體無益於人身莫過跪拜使韓子逢人不拜見君父不謁未必有賊於身體也然須拜謁以尊親者禮義至重不可失也故禮義在身身未必肥而禮義去身身未必瘠而化衰以謂有益禮義不如飲食使韓子賜食君父之前不拜而用肯爲之乎夫拜謁禮義之效非益身之實也然而韓子終不失者不廢禮義以苟益也 For bother and work for the body with no benefit to the person, nothing exceeds kneeling and making obeisance. If Mr. Han had not greeted people he met, not reported to ruler and father when interviewed by them, it would not necessarily have done him bodily harm. But we need to greet and report to show respect for those near us; such courtesy is most important and may not be slighted. Thus if courtesy is one of one's attributes it may not make one prosper, and if it is foreign to one it may not make one decline, but one's influence would be much less. As to the claim that courtesy is not comparable to food and drink for being beneficial, let Mr. Han be given food in the presence of his ruler or father and let him set to without making any acknowledgement to them; would he be willing to do it? Greeting and reporting are the evidences of courtesy, not pragmata to benefit oneself. But that Mr. Han lived his life out without some gross blunder is because he did not discard courtesy for the sake of a windfall profit.

儒生是棄禮義求飲食也使禮義廢綱紀敗上下亂而陰陽繆水旱失時五谷不登萬民飢死農不得耕士不得戰也子貢去告朔之餼羊孔子曰賜也爾愛其羊我愛其禮子貢惡費羊孔子重廢禮也故以舊防爲無益而去之必有水災以舊禮爲無補而去之必有亂患儒者之在世禮義之舊防也有之無益無之有損 Confucian scholars are courtesy and farming; war is food. Let courtesy be lost, the sins of society rot, social ranks be confused and the Yin and Yang will be muddled, dry and wet seasons get out of order, the grains will not come into ear and the people will die of famine, farmers will not get to plow and warriors will not get to fight. When Tzū-kung did away with the sacrifice of a sheep to announce the new moon, Confucius said, "Tz'ü, you begrudge the sheep, I begrudge the ceremony." Tzū-kung hated the expense of the sheep; Confucius hated the abandonment of the ceremony. Thus if you assume a long-standing dike does no good and clear it away, you will surely have a flood. If you assume a long-standing ritual does no help and abandon it, you will surely be troubled by disorderly behavior. The presence of Confucian scholars in the world is like a long-standing dike protecting courtesy. Having them benefits nothing, but lacking them would do harm.

d. match, pair up, harmonize

禮：昏禮者將合二姓之好上以事宗廟而下以繼後世也故君子重之 The nature of marriage is that it is meant to conjoin the good feeling of two families so as, looking backward, to serve the ancestral temple and, looking forward, to continue future generations. Thus the courtier holds it important.

淮：故百家之言指奏相反其合道一體也譬若絲竹金石之會樂同也其曲家異而不失於體 Thus the words of the various schools contradict each other diverging like splayed fingers, but all are of one likeness in how they accord with the Way. Compare how silk, bamboo, metal and stone all are suitable for making music. Their tunes differ from school to school, but without invalidating this likeness.

淮：夫禮者所以別尊卑異貴賤義者所以合君臣父子兄弟夫妻朋友之際也 To characterize, li is means of distinguishing honored and lowly and of differentiating high-ranking and low, while yi is means of bridging the gap between ruler and servant, parent and child, elder and younger sibling, husband and wife or friendly associates.

後：且設法禁者非能盡塞天下之姦皆合眾人之所欲也大抵取便國利事多者則可矣 Furthermore, one who sets forth laws and prohibitions cannot prevent all evildoing in the world, nor can he make things go the way everyone would want them to. If in general he chooses what mostly makes affairs of state go smoothly and beneficially, that is good enough.

隋：若夫法紫微以居中擬明堂而布政依分野而命國體眾星而效官動必順時教不違物故能成變化之道合陰陽之妙 If you imitate the Purple Palace in remaining in the center, hold to the Bright Hall in dispensing governance, give orders to states on the basis of the Assigned Fields, distribute offices by collating the many stars, always meet the occasion when you act, never depart from symbols in your teaching, then you will be able to accomplish the Way of vicissitude and accord with the mysteries of Yin and Yang.

g'ien 1.29 𠄎 talented, highly capable 41 賢

Another common term that is easy enough to understand in Chinese but hard to render into English. The sinological character-meaning is "worthy" which just won't do. No sense of moral worth is implied, while if it simply meant "worthy to govern" we would not see arguments about whether to promote for 賢 or 功 or 能.

It is neither general intelligence nor any specific talent. People are born with it—or not—but must also develop it through life experience in order for it to be discernable. Think of it as demonstrating, in one's own person rather than through objective accomplishment, the potential to choose the best among possible outcomes of a situation and steer it toward that outcome.

戰: 驚馬女子筋骨力動非賢於驥驥孟賁也 It is not that a nag or a girl is superior in strength of bone and muscle to a fine steed or a mighty warrior.

史: 公叔座知其賢未及進 Kungshu Ts'o saw he was brilliant, but not yet to the point of being recommended to the court.

藝: 勃知其賢禮待酬直過常 Po saw how promising he was; he treated him with courtesy and provided him board that exceeded the usual. [直 boarding fee] 新: [攻→] 工擊奪者為賢 Deft strongarm robbery was considered competence.

新：優賢不逮謂之寬反寬爲陋 If one favors capable ones and does not punish them at law it is called light-handedness; to invert light-handedness is tyranny.

呂：絕江者託於船致遠者託於驥霸王者託於賢 To cross the Yangtze, rely on a boat; to go a long way, rely on good horses; to rule the world, rely on competence.

外：夫賢者所以不爲存而亡者何也 How is it that competence did not bring about preservation but doom? 絕：賢者辯士見夫子作春秋而略吳越 Smart people with analytic minds saw that Confucius had given cursory treatment to Wu and Yüeh in writing the Chün-ch'ü.

人：夫聖賢之所美莫美乎聰明聰明之所貴莫貴乎知人 Of what highly talented men admire, nothing is more so than clear perception; of that they esteem nothing more highly than assessing people.

史：夫以韓之勁與大王之賢乃西面事秦交臂而服羞社稷而爲天下笑無大於此者 [矣→] 已 Now if, with Hân so powerful and YGM so competent, you were to face west and serve Ch'ín, folding your arms and submitting, there simply would be no worse case of shaming the state altars and looking a fool to the whole world than that.

越：有子四人長曰諸樊次曰餘祭次曰餘昧次曰季札季札賢壽夢欲立之季札讓曰禮有舊制奈何廢前王之禮而行父子之私乎 He had four sons. The eldest was called Chu-fan; the next was Yü-chi; the next was Yü-mai; the next was Chi-cha. Chi-cha was the most capable, and Shou-mêng wanted to designate him successor. Chi-cha refused in these words, "The pattern of the prescribed procedures is long established. How could we lay aside the prescribed procedures of the ancient kings and carry out a private agreement between father and son?"

非：宋王與齊仇也築武宮謳癸倡行者止觀築者不倦王聞召而賜之對曰臣師射稽之謳又賢於癸王召射稽使之謳行者不止築者知倦王曰行者不止築者知倦其謳不勝於癸美何也對曰王試度其功癸四板射稽八板擗其堅癸五寸射稽二寸 The king of Sung got in an arms race with Ch'i. He had the Martial Hall built, and the singer Kuei chanted the time, so well that passers-by stopped to observe and the men pounding the pisé never got tired. The king heard of it and summoned him to be rewarded. He said, "The chanting of my teacher, She Chi, is even more efficacious than mine." So the king summoned She Chi and had him chant. No passers-by stopped, nor were the pounders unaware of their fatigue. The king said, "No one stops, they feel their fatigue—why isn't his chanting as beautiful as yours, Kuei?" Kuei replied, "Let YM judge by the results: where I laid four boards' thickness of pisé, he got eight; and if you gouge it to test hardness, where I had it pounded down to five inches thick, he got it down to two."

呂：令者人主之所以爲命也賢不肖安危之所定也 Command is that by which the master of others carries out his mandate. It is that by which degrees of competence and security are fixed.

衡：論賢儒之才既超程矣世人怪其仕宦不進官爵卑細以賢才退在俗吏之後信不怪也夫如是而適足以見賢不肖之分睹高下多少之實也 Having established that the intellectual power of an accomplished scholar goes off the scale, our contemporaries are astonished that when appointed to office such scholars do not advance, remaining in low posts, with all their erudition, yet shoved below common ordinary functionaries. This is not really astonishing. It is only because things are this way that we can see the difference between skill and incompetence, and can make out what is really high and really low, really abundant and really sparse.

史：太史公曰女無美惡居宮見妒士無賢不肖入朝見疑 The History Supremo says, "All women, it does not matter if they are beautiful or ugly, meet jealousy when they come to dwell in the harem. All men, it does not matter if they are capable or blunderers, meet suspicion when they enter the court."

史：是故明主外料其敵之彊弱內度其士卒賢不肖不待兩軍相當而勝敗存亡之機固已形於胸中矣豈捨於眾人之言而以冥冥決事哉 Thus an intelligent ruler externally finds out how strong his enemies are and internally takes the measure of his own men's aptitude; he need not wait for the two armies to come face to face before knowing whether he will win or lose, survive or perish: the key to them is already well formed within his own mind. Under the Completion and Tranquility kings of Chou, punishments were put in abeyance and not used and good will extended to wild creatures and doctrine pervaded the four quarters. Nations from beyond the wilderness, Hsiao-shên, Pei-fa, Chü-sou and Ti-chiang came to submit. The stars did not deviate from their courses, the sun and moon were not eclipsed, mountain slopes never slid, valley streams were never blocked. Unicorns and phoenixes inhabited thickets near the capital; The Ho and the Luo sent forth diagrams and writings. Alas, what shall we do to reach this state? Now it has fallen to Us to uphold the ancestral temples. We rise early and strive; We retire late and ponder. We are as if crossing deep water still unsure of our landing. Is that not daunting? Is that not overwhelming? What is to be done so as to make obvious the grand aims and beneficent charisma of the former emperors and to connect to Yao and Shun in high antiquity and parallel the three kings in recent? That We have lacked perspicacity and have not been able to extend Our moral influence to distant places—this is something all you gentlemen and officers have heard and seen. The most capable are clear-sighted about the entirety of royal affairs ancient and modern. They will receive commissions to make close inquiry, and will all reply in writing, writing on rolls of bamboo strips which We will examine in person.” It was then that Tung Chung-shu, Kung-sun Hung and their associates came to prominence from among them.

Hui-tzu drew up a code of laws for the Benevolent King [of Wei]. When they had been completed he showed them to the elders. The elders all approved them, so he presented them to the king. The king was extremely pleased with them and showed them to Ti Chien, who said, “This is good.” The king said, “If it is good, then can it be put into effect?" Ti Chien replied, "No." The king said, "If it is good, why can't it be put into effect?" Ti Chien said, "Look at how people lift a big log; the ones in front sing out 'Yo Ho!' and the ones in back give a reply. This is a chant to encourage their exertion in lifting a heavy load. Needless to say, there are sophisticated tunes from Chêng and Wèi, but they could hardly be used here, being nowhere near so suitable as this chant. A well-governed state has customs, which do not depend on skilful wording." Thus Lao-tzu said, "The more clear the laws and decrees become, the more bandits and thieves there will be." 戰: 魏惠王死葬有日矣天大雨雪至於牛目塚城郭且為棧道而葬群臣多諫太子曰雪甚如此而喪行民必甚病之官費又恐不給請弛期更日太子曰為人子而以民勞與官費用之故而不行先王之喪不義也子勿復言群臣皆不敢言而以告犀首犀首曰吾未有以言之也是其唯惠公乎請告惠公惠公曰諾駕而見太子曰葬有日矣太子曰然惠公曰昔王季歷葬於楚山之尾樂水鬻其墓見棺之前和文王曰嘻先君必欲一見群臣百姓也夫故使樂水見之於是出而為之張於朝百姓皆見之三日而後更葬此文王之義也今葬有日矣而雪甚及牛目難以行太子為及日之故得毋嫌於欲亟葬乎願太子更日先王必欲少留而扶社稷、安黔首也故使雪甚因弛期而更為日此文王之義也若此而不弗為意者羞法文王乎太子曰甚善敬弛期更擇日 The Benevolent King of Wei died. When a date had been set for his funeral, it snowed heavily, deep as a cow's eye. They had broken the inner and outer city walls and were about to make a hearse-way and do the burial. Many of the officials objected to the heir-apparent, "If we let the burial proceed with the snow this deep the people will regard it as extreme hardship, and besides, we fear the official funds will not cover the extra expense. Let us delay and set another date." The heir-son said, "It is not proper for a man's son to fail to bury him in the manner of our ancestors on the mere grounds that it may use up the people's labor and the officials' funds. Do not speak of this again." None of the officials dared to mention it again. They told Rhinohead, who said, "There is nothing I can say to him. Hui-tzu is the only man for this job. Let me tell Hui-tzu about it." Hui-tzu agreed to try, and harnessed his carriage and went to see the heir-son. He said, "A date has been set for the burial." "It has," replied the heir-son. Hui-tzu said, "In ancient times, king Chi-li was buried at the tail of Ch'u mountain. The grave-mound was eroded by runoff, exposing the end of the coffin. The Cynosure King said, 'Oh! It must be that the former ruler wants to see his officials and his people one more time. That is why he let the runoff uncover him. Then he had him disinterred and set out in the capital, so that everyone could see him. Not until three days later was he reburied. This was the Cynosure King's style of proper behavior. In our case, a day was already set for the burial when it snowed as deep as a cow's eye, making it hard to travel. Could YH, on the mere grounds that the set date has arrived, avoid the suspicion of wanting to have him buried in too great a hurry? I ask YH to change the date; it must be that the former king wants to remain a while longer to calm the spirits and reassure the people. Thus he let the snow pile up so deep to give a reason for delay. To change the date would be the proper behavior of the Cynosure King. But if that's how it is and you still do not do it, could it be that you are embarrassed to follow the example of the Cynosure King?" The heir-son said, "Very well said! I respectfully extend the time and will choose another date." g'iweg 1.12 ^{vs} alienate 攜携携 懼鄰

What is called 學 consisted mostly of the memorization of hundreds of 說 (p), which were used in similar rhetorical fashion by all schools, regardless of their basic doctrine. We find references to what hard work 學 is and how one must struggle to stay awake during it (v. 睡). A common way—perhaps the most common—of memorizing consisted of reading a passage aloud, turning away from the text and chanting it until one had it by rote. The role of pronunciation in this process should be noted.

漢：八歲入小學學六甲五方書計之事始知室家長幼之節十五入大學學先聖禮樂而知朝廷君臣之禮 At eight sui [about six or seven years old] they enter elementary school to learn things like the cycle of sixty, geography, writing and arithmetic, and begin to become aware of the restrictions on age-groups within the family home. At fifteen they enter high school to learn the ritual and music of the ancient sage kings and become aware of the etiquette of behavior between ruler and minister in court.

荀：學惡乎始 惡乎終 曰其數則始乎誦經終

乎讀禮其義則始乎爲士終乎爲聖人 Where does study begin and where does it end? I say its method begins with chanting the classics and ends with reading rituals. Its content begins with becoming an officer and ends with becoming a sage.

If one opens land to cultivation and plants grain he is called a farmer. If one puts his skill into action and makes vessels he is called an artisan. If one puts capital into circulation and sells goods he is called a merchant. 論：學而時習之不亦說乎 To repeat at an opportune moment something one has memorized—is that not gratifying?

呂：甯越中牟之鄙人也 苦耕稼之勞 謂其友曰 何爲而可以免此苦也 其友曰 莫如學 學三十歲則可以達矣 甯越曰 請以十五歲人將休 吾將不敢休 人將臥 吾將不敢臥 Ning Yüeh was a rustic in Chung-mou. He suffered from the labor of plowing and sowing. He said to a friend, “What could I do to get away from this suffering?” His friend said, “Study is best. If you study for thirty years you can make a success of it.” Ning Yüeh said, “Let me try fifteen years. Where others would rest, I dare not rest; where others would sleep, I dare not sleep.”

法：學行之上也 言之次也 教人又其次也 咸無焉 爲眾人 As for learning: putting it into action is highest. Discussing it is next. Teaching it is even lower, and to do none of these qualifies one as common.

論：吾嘗終日不食 終夜不寢 以思 無益不如學也 I have sometimes gone all day without eating and all night without lying down in order to contemplate, in vain. Better to study.

國：居處好學 慈孝於父母 聽惠質仁 發聞於鄉里者 ones who have made a reputation in their villages for living quietly, loving study, being kind and filial to their parents, attentively gracious and substantially kind

漢：護誦醫經本草方術數十萬言 長者咸愛重之 共謂曰 以君卿之材 何不宦學乎 Hu had many hundred thousand words of medical texts, herbaries and materia medica by rote, so that elders of the family all thought him very promising and said that Chün-ching had talent and that he ought to study for an official career.

論：吾十有五而志於學 After fifteen I was committed to learning.

衡：無所師友 [有一] 又不學書 He took no one as teacher or companion, nor did he study writings.

論：夫子焉不學 而亦何常師之有 How could the master not have studied, and yet what ordinary teacher could there have been [for such a genius]?

g'u 3.50 ruler; consort of ruler 89 后

By late Chankao this word had come to mean the officially designated principal consort of a ruler (emperor, king or prince). Some of its early occurrences seem to designate a man. For instance, 夏后 was the mythical ruler 禹. The historical development of this word would be worth studying. The culture-hero 后稷, for example, was set out to die as an infant, treatment that, to judge by other reported examples, more likely indicated a girl baby. 白: 天子之配謂之后后者何也明海內之小君也 The emperor's mate is called "empress". What does it mean? A lesser ruler who is emblazoned to all of civilization.

隋: 氏四星王者之[宿一]後宮后妃之府休解之房前二星適也後二星妾也 The four stars of ti are chambers of rest and storage of the wives in the harem of the kingly ruler, the front two stars are wives, the rear two concubines.

國: 十八年王黜狄后 In the eighteenth year, the king degraded his Ti-barbarian wife from the rank of queen.

釋: 天子之妃曰后 The consort of an emperor is called "empress."

左: 后緡方娠 Queen Min was then pregnant. [緡 pers name]

非: 貴妾不使二后 to increase the rank of a harem girl without letting her become a second queen

楚: 后皇嘉樹橘徠服兮受命不遷生南國兮 The most pleasant tree in the world, the orange came to offer its submission/ It acceded to a decree not to go anywhere, and grows in the southern states. [commentator says 后 = 后土, 皇 = 皇天]

史: 后妾不和適孽誣爭陷于不義以滅國 The empress and the concubines are in discord, the sons in the direct and collateral lines vie in slander and lapse into misdeeds that may be the ruin of the state.

周: 掌其厚薄之齊以共王之四飲三酒之饌及后世子之飲與其酒 He regulates their grades of filtration so as to provide the supply of four beverages and three wines to the king and also beverage and wine to the queen and prince.

 c. 行行 walk and walk
 I had been taking 行行 in this idiom as a reduplicated noun, “street after street”. But further examples indicate it is more plausibly taken as this verb, which makes it unlikely to be a reduplicated form. A Mandarin translation would be 走着走着, which I see as repetition rather than reduplication. I now apply the same analysis to the CC expression. Examples with other non-stative verbs might be informative.

g'ied 3.6 Yangtze river porpoise Lipotes
vexillifer 鯨 鯨 爾: 鯨 [=一] 鯨鯨 [two synonyms] 郭璞 scholium:
 大腹喙小...鼻在額上...胎生...江中多有之
 It has a big belly but its snout is small...its nose is above its forehead...it is born from a womb...
 there are many of them throughout the Yangtze.

This word is a good occasion for a comment on the philological difficulties attendant on study of traditional Chinese biology, alchemy and medicine.
 Scientific taxonomy does not map onto traditional Chinese taxonomy in a coherent way. For example, the description in the gloss of 郭璞 quoted above is clearly that of an air-breathing placental mammal, most likely either Lipotes vexillifer or Sousa chinensis, the word being applied to either species interchangeably. (The two are distinguished in modern Chinese as 河豚 and 海豚; the name 河豚 is also used for pufferfish, while Lipotes is also called 白鯨, a more formal term.) So where does 郭璞 place 鯨 in the animal kingdom? He says 鯨屬也 "a kind of sawfish".

Sawfish (Pristis spp. & Anoxypristis japonensis) are elasmobranch fish. To class porpoises among these makes as much sense to a biologist as calling them a kind of frog or a kind of crow. To a casual observer they are quite similar, especially the snout of the porpoise and the rostrum of the sawfish, both of which serve these bottom-feeders to probe mud for buried edibles. Another point of superficial resemblance is that sawfish are ovoviviparous. Not only sawfish are called 鯨; another sort of ovoviviparous bottom-feeding elasmobranch with a prominent rostrum also gets that name: saw sharks, eg Pristiophorus japonicus.

Lipotes is also called 鯨, homophonous with 題 "forehead", to which it may be related (the porpoise's brow is prominent). The same word (also written 鯨 or 鯨) also names a catfish, Silurus soldatovi, while if written 鯨 (also 鯨 or 鯨) it names a salamander Cryptobranchus japonicus.
 The salamander is also called 鯨, which is also a term for a female whale; it is also called 人魚, which also is a name for the dugong.

We must also be prepared to find any of these names occurring in a text in which it is applied to yet another creature. Thus in many cases we cannot distinguish names of species without context, and in some cases not even with context.

大國 Lionland is a neighboring state of India. Its land is very suitable. There is no difference between

was uninhabited, only goblins and dragons living there. Merchants and traders from all lands came there together to sell and trade. The goblins never let their forms be seen; they only put out valuable things and let the price they would accept be known. The merchants chose according to price. People in other countries heard that the land was happy, and so vied to get there.

Some remained and so became a good-sized state.

GSR accepts this loan-graph theory, which seems to me less persuasive in phonetic terms than the similarity to 悸 g'iwəd, not to mention that using a lump of dirt to beat a drum made of dirt is implausible to say the least. The topic of this paragraph (translated in full under 禮 沓) is the primitive origin of all things connected with ritual ceremony. One feature of many such ceremonies was coordinated group movements that might be termed either dances or pantomimes. (V. note under 舞.) This writer seems to suggest that their origin was the elaboration of the arm motions of drummers.]

Yen Shuai replied, "Our poor city takes the liberty of considering that Your Majesty has indeed got a serious problem. These cauldrons are not like pickle jars or sauce bottles; their lifting-handles are of a size to embrace with your arms. Hoisting them and getting them to Ch'i will be nothing like birds flocking, crows flying, rabbits hopping, horses galloping, blithely flitting into Ch'i. Long ago when Chou chastised Yin and obtained the nine cauldrons, each cauldron took ninety thousand men to draw its wagon. Nine times that makes eight hundred ten thousand men, with officers and sergeants, army troops, weapons and implements and shelter gear, all also needed in proportion to that number. Supposing your Majesty to have that many men, by what route will you come out? I personally take the liberty of feeling sorry for your Majesty."

b. meton meeting to reconsider a decision

後：熹平元年竇太后崩太后本遷南宮雲臺宦者積怨竇氏遂以衣車載后尸置城南市舍數日中常侍曹節王甫欲用貴人禮殯帝曰太后親立朕躬統承大業詩云無德不報無言不酬豈宜以貴人終乎於是發喪成禮及將葬節等復欲別葬太后而以馮貴人配祔詔公卿大

會朝堂令中常侍趙忠監議 In AD 172 the empress dowager of the Tou family died. The empress dowager had originally been transferred to the Cloud Tower in the South Palace. The eunuchs had amassed resentment against the Tou family. They proceeded to move the empress's body to a lodge in the market south of the city by a clothing wagon for several days. The regular palace attendants Ts'ao Chieh and Wang Fu wanted to conduct her funeral by the rites for a consort of the first rank. The emperor said, “The empress dowager began Our body in her own person, accepting and continuing the great [ie imperial] lineage. The ode (256, which has these two lines in the reverse order) says, ‘There is no kindness we do not requite; there are no words we do not answer.’ It is surely not fitting for her to end in the status of a first-rank consort.” Then they opened the grave and went through the ceremonies. When they had got to the point of burying her, Chieh and the others still wanted to bury the empress dowager separately and put the first-rank consort of the Fêng family in the temple as wife. All ministers including the highest were summoned to a meeting in the court hall, with the regular palace attendant Chao Chung to oversee discussion.

後：太尉李咸時病乃扶輿而起擣椒自隨謂妻子曰若皇太后不得配食恒帝吾不生還矣 Grand Commandant Li Hsien was ill at that time. He had himself lifted from bed. All his family went with him. He said to his wife and children, “If the empress dowager is not made temple-partner of the Foursquare Emperor, I will in that case not come home alive.”

後：既議坐者數百人各瞻望中官良久莫肯先言趙忠曰議當時定怪公卿以下各相顧望球曰皇太后以盛德良家母臨天下宜配先帝是無所疑忠笑而言曰陳廷尉宜便操筆 When the meeting had convened, the attendees, amounting to several hundred men, sat for a long time looking at the eunuchs, none willing to be the first to speak. Chao Chung said, “The question ought to be resolved in timely fashion. I marvel at how from the highest ministers on down you all just look at each other.” Ch'iu said, “It is assuredly beyond dispute that the empress dowager, of her abundant personal goodness and being of an estimable family, oversaw the world in a motherly way, and ought to be enrolled with our former emperor. Chung laughed and said, “Chief magistrate Ch'ên had better get his pen in action in a hurry.”

This transition gives an opportunity for direct comparison of informal and formal styles of imperial court discourse.

後：球即下議曰皇太后自在椒房有聰明母儀之德 Ch'iu then set down a critique in these words: “Since HIM had dwelt in the dower house, she had been a good influence as a model of alert motherhood. 後：遭時不造援立聖明承繼宗廟功烈至重 “In the course of events [ie when her husband, the former emperor, died] she became unable to stir abroad; she then assisted to establish the supernal intelligence [ie her son, the present emperor] and to pass along the ancestral temple. She succeeded brilliantly in that in very important ways. [This is all boilerplate, stock phrases that any senior courtier could probably have written in his sleep.]

後：先帝晏駕因遇大獄遷居空宮不幸早世家雖獲罪事非太后今若別葬誠失天下之望 “When the former emperor passed away, she thereupon came up on serious charges, was shunted away to an empty dwelling-hall and, alas, died early. Though her family was implicated, the events had nothing to do with the empress dowager. If we now bury her separately, we will profoundly disappoint the whole world.

後：且馮貴人冢墓被發骸骨暴露與賊併尸魂靈汙染且無功於國何宜上配至尊 “Furthermore, the grave mound of Consort-of-first-rank Fêng was subjected to pillage. Her bones were left out in the open, exposed in the same manner as those of criminals. The supernatural force of her remnant spirit was polluted and will do no good for the state. How could she be suited to be paired with the most highly honored one?”

後：忠省球議作色俛仰蜚球曰陳廷尉建此議甚健 Chung examined Ch'iu's critique. His expression changed and he rocked back and forth. He twitted Ch'iu, “Chief magistrate Ch'ên composed this critique with great force.”

後：球曰陳竇既冤皇太后無故幽閉臣常痛心天下憤歎今日言之退而受罪宿昔之願[也] Ch'iu said, “Ch'ên and Tou having been given cause for resentment, when the empress dowager was banished for no reason, I have often been pained by that, and the whole world has sighed aloud for it. If I speak of it today and, having withdrawn, am punished for it, that is what I have wished for for a long time.

後：公卿以下皆從球議李咸始不敢先發見球辭正然大言曰臣本謂宜爾誠與臣意合會者皆為之愧 From the highest ministers on down, all accorded with Ch'iu's critique. Li Hsien had not dared to be the first to speak out. When he saw that Ch'iu's way of putting it was accurate, he loudly proclaimed, “I said at first that it was fitting. This truly accords with my intention.” All at the meeting were ashamed for him.

後：曹節王甫復爭以為梁后家犯惡逆別葬懿陵武帝黜廢衛后而以李夫人配食今竇氏罪深豈得合葬先帝乎 [After the meeting!] Ts'ao Chieh and Wang Fu persisted in their opposition. They adduced in it that the empress of the Liang family was buried separately at Yi-ling, her family having been guilty of sedition, and that the Martial Emperor demoted and set aside the empress of the Wei family and had the tablet of the consort of the Li family put next his in the ancestral temple. In this case the guilt of the Tou family is profound; how could she get to be buried in the same grave as the former emperor?

後：李咸乃詣闕上疏曰臣伏惟章德竇后虐害恭懷安思閭后家犯惡逆而和帝無異葬之議順朝無貶降之文至於衛后孝武皇帝身所廢棄不可以為比 Li Hsien then went to the emperor and submitted a clarification. It said, “YS has humbly considered whether the Tou empress was maliciously harmful. The families of the Liang empress and the Yen empress committed crimes, but there was no discussion of separate burial under the Harmony Emperor, nor do the court documents of the Complaisant Emperor contain anything about criticism or demotion. Touching the matter of the Wei empress, one who was personally set aside by the Martial Emperor himself cannot be considered comparable. 後：今長樂太后尊號在身親嘗稱制坤育天下且援立聖光隆皇祚太后以陛下爲子陛下豈得不以太后爲母子無黜母臣無貶君宜合葬宣陵一如舊制 Here the dowager of the Prolonged Joy [Palace] has the most honorable appellation to herself. She has personally been in charge of government, taking care of everyone in motherly fashion. She also assisted to establish the supernal intelligence. She is greatly eminent and vastly blessed. HIM treated YIM as a son; how could YIM not treat her as a mother? A son does not send away his mother nor a servant denigrate his ruler. She ought to be buried together at Hsüan-ling, entirely in accordance with long-standing criteria.”

後：帝省奏謂曹節等曰竇氏雖爲不道而太后有德於朕不宜降黜節等無復言於是議者乃定 The emperor perused the memorial and said to Ts'ao Chieh and the others, “Even though the Tou clan did wrong, the empress dowager deserves gratitude from Us. It would not do to demote and expel her.” Chieh and the others had no more to say. Thereupon the discussion was settled.

 法: 惟五經爲辯說天者莫辯乎易說事者莫

辯乎書說體者莫辯乎禮說志者莫辯乎詩說理者莫辯乎春秋 It is the five classics that are really subtle. Nothing is more subtle at explaining affairs than Changes, nothing more subtle at explaining intentions than Writings, nothing more subtle at explaining exemplification than Rites, nothing more subtle at explaining intentions than Odes, nothing more subtle at explaining reason than Spring-Autumn. 後: 博學多通遍習五經 He had studied widely and mastered much; he could recite the five classics entirely from memory.

ngoká ^{nc} meton for 5-man squad in 齊 五家左: 齊侯謂夷儀人曰得敵無存者以五家免乃得其尸 The Marquess of Ch'i said to the men of Yi-yi, "Whoever finds Pi Wu-ts'un will be excused, along with his squad-mates, from further service." They then recovered his corpse.

This expression affords a view of the process of comparing texts. In the 史記 biography of 蘇秦 we find this:

史: 三軍之良五家之兵進如鋒矢戰如雷霆解如風雨 The good men of the whole army, the soldiers of the five-man squads, rush forward like spears and arrows, do battle like thunder-claps and disperse like wind and rain.

Note the use of parallelism to refer to all levels of the army from its entirety 三軍 down to its smallest units 五家. In a variation edition of 戰國策 we find this:

戰: [齊車→]三軍之良五家之兵疾如[錐→]鋒矢戰如雷電解如風雨 The good men of the whole army, the soldiers of the five-man squads, rush forward like spears and arrows, do battle like thunder-claps and disperse like wind and rain.

Here are inserted two notes: 姚本五家五國 "In the Yao edition, 五家 is glossed as 五國," and 鮑本管仲軍令始於五家為軌 "The Pao edition says, 'The military regulations of Kuan Chung start by taking five families as normative.'"

Instructive points are first that failure to recognize a word will not always inhibit an exegete from making a wild guess at it. The gloss 五國 for 五家 in this context is patently absurd.

Second, the error 齊車 for 三軍 may not be as random as it might at first appear. The graphs 車 and 軍 are obviously subject to confusion, but so are 齊 and 三 in old forms, eg 𠄎 and 𠄎.

日聞聖人之言也西河之政專委之子矣 The Martial Marquess of Wei was on a boating party with his great officers at Hsi Ho. He declaimed, "The security of our fastness of mountain and river is surely impregnable!" Wang Chung, in attendance on the ruler, said, "This is how the state of Chin became stong. If this were to be properly developed, no more would be needed to accomplish the work of becoming overlord." Wu Ch'i replied, "What you have said, Milord, is the way to endanger the state, and you, sir, have laid on yet more of it. That is really dangerous." The Martial Marquess got miffed and said, "Is there some explanation for your remarks?" Wu Ch'i replied, "Fastness of mountain and river is not worth fortifying. The way to becoming first baron does not lie through here. "Once the San Miao's territory had the P'eng-li marsh on its left and the Tung-t'ing swamp on its right. It had Wen mountain to the south and Heng mountain to the north. Relying on this fastness, they governed badly and Yü drove them out and chased them away. Or take Chieh of the Hsia. His state had the Yin of T'ien Men on its left and the Yang of T'ien Ch'i on its right. Lu marsh was on its north and the Yi and Lo arose to its south. Such was the fastness he had, but he governed badly and T'ang attacked them. Ch'ou of the Yin's state had Meng Men on its left and Chang Fu on its right. It had the Ho in front as its belt and mountains at its back as its cape. Such was the fastness he had, but he governed badly and the Martial King attacked him. Furthermore, YL has accompanied me in person when we ascended the walls of cities that had surrendered. It was not that their walls weren't high, nor was it that their population was small. The fact that nonetheless we were able to annex them was because their government was bad. Look at it that way, and how could the remoteness of one's geographic situation be enough to propel one to overlordship?" The Martial Marquess said, "Good. Today I have finally heard the words of a sage. The government of Hsi Ho will be entirely given to you, sir."

come, assess the odds of survival and be clear about prospects of success. They said that the spirits participate in human affairs, retaining the past and foreseeing the future, helping us by means of cryptic sayings and obscure signs. Given that they cause benefit and do away with harm, they also overawe the multitude, letting power be firmly held. The saying, "The way of the spirits establishes doctrine" likely comes from this. But fraudulent imposition does not differ much from uncanny omens; contorted misrepresentation can only with difficulty be traced to its source. The techniques are a maze leading every which way; the manifestations obstinately refuse to follow a unique line. The real thing may exist, but frauds may be concealed in it. The sage (Confucius) never spoke of uncanniness, feats of strength, rebellions or spirits; he had good reasons for that. In his day [Tso] Ch'ü-ming led the way in beginning with a prophetic dream to which to append a story, and [Szü-ma] Tz'ü-ch'ang continued his work in using divination to motivate an account. From that time forward, scribes have never ceased to write of it. Martial of the Han admired and loved immortals (Grand-martial was even more besotted by the art of fortune-telling) so he allowed Wên-ch'êng [General Li Shao] and Wu-li [General Lüan Ta] to gain honor and renown by uncontrolled deceptions. Yin Min and Huan T'an incurred criminal punishment for having enlightened their contemporaries. Aren't these clearly cases of seeing what is hidden to others or of making one mistake out of a thousand evaluations? Examining these many arts in detail, we relegate them to the periphery of science; if we discarded them entirely and that turned out to be mistaken it would be a pity, but if we preserve them it is still doubtful that they will work as intended. Given that the point of keeping records is to be inclusive, the principle governing their editing should be detailed completeness. The reason the Chin referred to them as "vehicles" is to be found in this. Here I record in accounts of thaumaturges those of them whose predictions were especially precise and whose technical skill was noteworthy, in an attempt to bring up to date what previous scribes have said on the topic.

This essay illustrates a number of attitudes to be found in the higher Confucianism. One is reminded of Gibbon's famous remark about the role of religions in the Roman empire.

Chao Yang said to the king of Ch'u, “When the five nations have been its instrument of smashing Ch'i, Ch'in is sure to turn its attention south to Ch'u.” When the king asked what to do about it, he replied, “The Hân family grip the state; they are self-aggrandizing but wary of conflict. That means they can be corralled by greed and controlled by fear. If we offer them a huge bribe so as to fill their minds with thoughts of what they stand to gain they will certainly rein them in, and if we then overawe them with the full extent of our military might they will surely be afraid of us. With them afraid of our might and governed by our wealth, anything the alliance of five do can be brought to nothing. And after they have broken the treaty, we need not even cede them any land.” The king approved and sent Ta Kung as envoy to Hân. He met with Kung-chung and said, “The business at Niu-lan and the trouble at Ma-ling are things your king himself has seen. If the king would refrain from taking any military action on account of the alliance of five, we would like to cede certain territory of ours to you, to wit five cities, and we would also like to mobilize our full power in defense of Ch'i.” After Ch'i had repulsed Chao and Wei, Ch'u did not cede the territory after all; thus was the alliance of five founded.

衡：夫遭遇幸偶或與命祿并或與命祿離 Now, coincidence and lucky chance in some cases match destiny and fortune, and in some cases depart from destiny and fortune.

thing happening to them, idiopathically enfeebled, they run out of energy and die.

後：詔太山琅邪遇賊者[勿→]毋收租賦復更算三年 It was ordered by rescript that those who had encountered bandits at Mt. Tai or Lang-yeh were not to be assessed crop tax or poll tax and for three years were to be exempt from labor assessment.

後：先帝晏駕因遇大獄遷居空宮不幸早世 When the former emperor passed away, she thereupon came up on serious charges, was shunted away to an empty dwelling-hall and, alas, died early.

淮：是故聖人得志而在上位讒佞姦邪而欲犯主者譬猶雀之見鷓而鼠之遇狸也亦必無餘命矣 Thus when the great wise man reaches his goal and is on the throne, anyone who is slanderous, ingratiating, treacherous or evil and means to go against the ruler is like a sparrow meeting a sparrow-hawk or a mouse meeting a raccoon-dog: he would have no longer left to live than they.

非：或曰雍季之對不當文公之問凡對問者有因問小大緩急而對也所問高大而對以卑狹則明主弗受也今文公問以少遇眾而對曰後必無復此非所以應也 In rebuttal, I say that Yung Chi's reply was not appropriate to the Cynosure Marquess's question. Always in replying to a question, one goes by its degree of importance and of urgency in replying. If what is asked is high and great and the reply is low and cramped, an intelligent ruler will not accept it. Here the Cynosure Marquess asked about opposing a large force with small one, and the reply was in terms of not being able to do it again. That is not the kind of answer that was called for.

史：力田不如逢年善仕不如遇合 Better than hard work an abundant harvest, better than skilful service a well-placed patron.

梁：約性不飲酒少嗜欲雖時遇隆重而居處儉素 Yüeh was by nature a non-drinker and abstemious. Although at times he found himself in high and important positions, his private life was frugal and simple. [少 put caus fac]

史：范雎蔡澤世所謂一切辯士然游說諸侯至白首無所遇者非計策之拙所為說力少也 Fan Sui and Ts'ai Tsé were what are called “consummate rhetors”; that they went from baron to baron till their hair turned white, delivering their proposals and never finding acceptance was not because their proposals were inept but because the barons to whom they delivered them lacked the power to put them in effect.

d. also of things

釋：雪綏也水下遇寒氣而綏綏然也 siwat “snow” is snīwar “comforting;” water descends, encounters cold vapor and freezes, becomes gentle and quiet.

隋：張衡...所鑄之圖遇亂堙滅星官名數今亦不存 The portrayal that [Chang Hêng] cast vanished in consequence of rebellion, nor does his list of star and constellation names and numbers survive.

衡：流血出膿豈癰疽所發身之善穴哉營衛之行遇不通也 Surely this flow of blood and issue of pus could not be because the body on which the pustules and ulcers form thinks pits are good things? It is because the blood encountered an impasse in its course.

後：仲尼喪母冢高四尺遇雨而崩弟子請修之夫子泣曰古不修墓 When Confucius buried his mother the grave mound was made one meter high. Rain got at it and it collapsed. His disciples asked to be allowed to repair it. The master, weeping, said, “In ancient times they did not repair graves.”

呂：凡遇合也時不合必待合而後行故比翼之鳥死乎木比目之魚死乎海孔子周流海內再干世主如齊至衛所見八十餘君委質為弟子者三千人達徒七十人七十人者萬乘之主得一人用可為師不為無入以此游僅至於魯司寇此天子之所以時絕也諸侯之所以大亂也亂則愚者之多幸也幸則必不勝其任矣任久不勝則幸反為禍其幸大者其禍亦大非禍獨及己也故君子不處幸不為苟必審諸己然後任任然後動 All matching up is fitting in. If at the time one does not fit in one must wait to fit in and only act afterward. Thus a one-winged bird might die in its tree, a one-eyed fish might die in the sea. Confucius roamed everywhere in civilization, repeatedly meeting the masters of the time; from Ch'i to Wèi there were more than eighty rulers that he saw and three thousand men who put their estates in trust to become his disciples of whom seventy became accomplished students. Of those seventy, if the ruler of a state of ten thousand chariots got to employ one of them as his tutor, he did not consider himself to lack men. Carrying this [ie his obvious genius] from place to place, the highest he rose was to become chief constable in Lu. This is how the time of emperors came to an end and the feudal rulers fell into great chaos. During chaos it is mostly stupid ones who are favored; benefiting from favoritism, they surely cannot master their tasks. When their tasks have gone unmastered for a long time, favor turns into disaster. The greater the favor has been, the greater the disaster, and it is not only themselves to whom the disaster comes. Thus gentlemen do not rest content with what is fortuitous nor strive for what arrives by chance. They necessarily refer a thing to their own experience before assigning tasks, and only after assigning tasks do they initiate action. 呂：凡能聽說者必達乎論議者也世主之能識論議者寡所遇惡得不苟凡能聽音者必達於五聲人之能知五聲者寡所善惡得不苟客有以吹籟見越王者羽角宮徵商不謬越王不善為野音而反善之說之道亦有如此者也 All who are capable of benefiting from discourse are necessarily ones who are accomplished in rational discussion. Few of the rulers of the present age are able to recognize rational discussion, so is it any wonder that those [civil servants] with whom they match up arrive by chance? All who can listen to music are necessarily accomplished in the five tones. Few men can recognize the five tones, so is it any wonder they find something good only by chance? There was a visitor who got an audience with the king of Yüeh by blowing a bare tube. His [five tones] yü, chiao, kung, chih and shang were never off. The king of Yüeh thought it poor stuff, but changed his mind when the man played some rude melodies. The way of discourse is like that in some respects.

呂：人有爲人妻者人告其父母曰嫁不必生也衣器之物可外藏之以備不生其父母以爲然於是令其女常外藏姑始知之曰爲我婦而有外心不可畜因出之婦之父母以謂爲己謀者以爲忠終身善之亦不知所以然矣宗廟之滅天下之失亦由此矣 A woman was engaged to be married. Someone told her parents, "Marriage is not necessarily for life. The clothes and pots [of her dowry] could be stored outside her new home in case the marriage does not last." Her parents saw the force of that, and thereupon ordered their daughter always to store her dowry outside. The mother-in-law observed that and said, "She married into our family but her sentiments lie elsewhere. She cannot be kept." So they divorced her. The wife's parents reported that to the one who had given them the idea, and considered him a true friend. Nor did they realize for the rest of their lives how it had actually come about. The extinction of ancestral lines and the loss of the whole word also stem from this.

呂：故曰遇合也無常說適然也若人之於色也無不知說美者而美者未必遇也故嫫母執乎黃帝黃帝曰厲女德而弗忘與女正而弗衰雖惡奚傷 Thus we say matching up is fitting in. There is no consistent explanation that is perfectly correct. It is like peoples' attitude to physical appearance; no one fails to realize that we are pleased by beauty, but beauty does not necessarily match up. Thus Mu-ma was taken up by Huang Ti. He said, "If I attach my attraction to you and you do not forget it, if I give the governance [of the household] to you and you do not damage it, though you are ugly what could that hurt?"

呂：若人之於滋味無不說甘脆而甘脆未必受也文王嗜昌蒲菹孔子聞而服之縮頰而食之三年然後勝之人有大臭者其親戚兄弟妻妾知識無能與居者自苦而居海上海上人有說其臭者晝夜隨之而弗能去 It is like people's attitude to the taste of food; no one dislikes sweet and tender, but what is sweet and tender may not be accepted. The Cynosure King liked pickled calamus. Confucius heard about it and took some. He wrinkled his nose while eating it and it was three years before he got over it. There was a man who had a strong odor. His family, brothers, wife, junior wives and acquaintances could none of them stay with him. He felt bad about it and went to dwell at the seaside. There were people at the seaside who liked his smell; day and night they followed him around and could not drag themselves away from him.

Wei being stronger will certainly cut a deep chunk of Chao territory. Chao will be unable to accept that and will resist more sturdily. This will weaken both equally." Ching She said, "Not so! Chao Hsi-Hsü doesn't know what he is talking about. Now, in Wei's attack on Chao they fear an attack in their rear by Chü. In fact, if we don't aid Chao, Chao will be in a desperate position and Wei will have no threat from Chü, in effect both Wei and Chü ganging up on Chao. It will do them tremendous damage—how could it weaken both equally? Chao will see that they are in desperate straits and will realize that Chü will not aid them, and they will have to come to some accommodation with Wei, allowing them to turn their attention to Chü. Better to send a small force of assistance to Chao. Chao, relying on Chü's power, will then fight a major battle with Wei. Wei, angered by Chao's powerful response and seeing that Chü's assistance is not worth bothering about, will not let Chao off lightly. With Chao and Wei weakening each other and Chü and Ch'in responding to Chü's initiative, Wei can be smashed. The king of Chü accordingly had Ching She raise a force to aid Chao. Han-tan was taken and Chü took the area between the Shui and the Wai rivers.

The Cynosure Marquess said, "No, you go. You will surely accomplish your aims and make your reputation." Hsi-men Pao said, "May I ask if there is really some method for accomplishing aims and making reputation?" The Cynosure Marquess said, "There is. For instance, when you entertain the elders of the city, receive them beforehand and show them to their seats. When the younger officers come in, ask who among them is especially competent, and serve them as if they were your teachers. Seek out those who like to downplay others' merits and call attention to others' vices, and pump them for information. "There are many things that resemble each other but are unlike. The green shoots of grass resemble those of barley; the roar of a yak resembles a tiger's. White bone looks like ivory and soapstone looks like jade. But none of these is what it seems."
The point is to seem as if one is impressed by the rank and reputation attained by certain of one's subjects, while remaining aware that rank and reputation are worse than useless when genuine ability is needed. And one may have to gossip with some very unpleasant people to get the inside skinny on those one knows only by public reputation.

Tzū-fang said, "I have heard that if a ruler is intelligent he likes administration but if not he likes music. Now YL pays careful attention to sounds; YS wonders if YL may be deaf to administration." The Cynosure Marquess said, "Good. You have taught me something."

戰：危於累卵 More precarious than a pile of eggs.

藝：晉靈公驕奢造九層之臺謂左右敢諫者斬孫息聞之求見公曰子何能孫息曰臣能累十二棋加九雞子其上公曰吾少學未嘗見也子爲寡人作之孫息即正顏色定志意以棋子置上加雞子其上左右嚮息靈公俯伏氣息不續公曰危哉孫息曰公爲九層之臺三年不成危甚於此 The Numinous Marquess of Chin was arrogant and self-indulgent. He had a nine-story tower built and said to his entourage, "Who dares object will lose his head." When Sun Hsi heard of it he requested audience. The marquess said, "What can you do?" Sun Hsi said, "I can pile up twelve go-stones and nine eggs on top of them." The marquess said, "I haven't studied much, but I've never seen that. Do that for me." Sun Hsi composed his countenance and focused his will; he piled go-stones vertically and added eggs on top of them. The entourage gasped in alarm; the Numinous Marquess bent double and did not continue breathing. He said, "That's precarious!" Sun Hsi said, "YL has been building a nine-story tower for three years now and it isn't finished yet. That's more precarious than this."

莊：嘗與汝登高山履危石臨百仞之淵若能射乎 Suppose we try this: I will climb a high mountain with you, we will stand on a precipice and we will look down into a thousand-foot chasm. Would you be able to shoot then?

釋：三百斛曰綱綱[貂→]矧也[貂→]矧短也江南所名短而廣安不傾危者也 Of three hundred hu call them tiab. "Boat" is "short"; "short" means "short." South of the Yangtze this is what they call a boat that is short and broad and secure, not inclined to tip over.

史：秦兵之攻楚也危難在三月之內而楚待諸侯之救在半歲之外此其勢不相及也。If Chin attacks Chü, you will be dangerously pressed within three months, but waiting for help from the other barons will take over half a year. These tactical situations do not match.

非：紂為長夜之飲懼以失日問其左右盡不知也乃使人問箕子箕子謂其徒曰為天下主而一國皆失日天下其危矣一國皆不知而我獨知之吾其危矣辭以醉而不知。Chòu had a long day-and-night drinking session. He went into a tizzy because he had lost track of what day it was. He asked his retainers, none of whom knew either. So he sent someone to ask Chi-tzü. Chi-tzü said to one of his followers, "Leaders of the world, yet the whole country has lost track of what day it is—the world is in precarious condition. And if the whole country has lost track and only I know it, I am in precarious condition." He declined to answer, claiming that he was too drunk to know it.

新：借使秦王論上世之事並殷周之跡以制御其政後雖有淫驕之主猶未有傾危之患也。Supposing for the sake of argument that the king of Chin had analyzed the events of the past and compared what remained of Yin and Chou, so as to keep his government under control, even if later there might have been unbridled arrogant rulers there still would not have been the anguish of dwelling on the brink of overthrow.

新: 借使秦王論上世之事並殷周之跡以制御其政後雖有淫驕之主猶未有傾危之患也 Supposing for the sake of argument that the king of Ch'in had analyzed the events of the past and compared what remained of Yin and Chou, so as to keep his government under control, even if later there might have been unbridled arrogant rulers there still would not have been the anguish of dwelling on the brink of overthrow.

戰: 今欲并天下凌萬乘誅敵國制海內子元元臣諸侯非兵不可 In this case if you want to unite the world, dominate the powerful, subdue your peers, organize all civilized lands, treat good people as you would your children and turn the barons into your servitors, nothing else but war will do.

釋: 周制九夫為井其似井字也井 In the Chou system, nine blokes would constitute a ching, from its resemblance to the graph.

西: 漢制天子玉几冬則加緋錦其上謂之緋几 Han ordained a jade-inlaid low table for the emperor. In winter it was covered with thick silk brocade. It was called "thick silk table".

荀: 故聖人化性而起偽偽起而生禮義禮義生而制法度然則禮義法度者是聖人之所生也 Thus the sages began contrivance in altering their nature. When contrivance was begun it gave rise to courtesy and right conduct. Those two having arisen, they formulated laws and rules. That being so, courtesy, right conduct, laws and rules are things the sages brought into being.

史: 上尊號王為泰皇命為制令為詔天子自稱

曰朕 We submit honorifics: YM is to become Supreme Great One; decrees are to become rescripts; orders are to become summons; and YM is to refer to himself as We.

淮: 昔者神農無制令而民從唐虞有制令而無刑罰夏后氏不負言殷人誓周人盟 In ancient times, Shên Nung gave no orders; Yao and Shun gave orders but no punishments; Yü never went back on his word; the Yin swore oaths; the Chou made treaties.

新: 臨制不犯謂之嚴反嚴為軟 If in carrying out orders one permits no exceptions it is called being stern; to invert sternness is weakness.

b. 制度 system

漢: 是時征伐四夷開置邊郡軍旅數發內改制度朝廷多事婁舉賢良文學之士 At the time we were punishing barbarians on all sides, establishing new commanderies on the frontiers, sending out many military expeditions and altering our forms of administration. The court was very busy, and frequently selected gentry of talent or education.

漢: 諠以爲漢興二十餘年天下和洽宜當改正朔易服色制度定官名興禮樂乃草具其儀法色上黃數用五爲官名悉更奏之 [Chia] Yi took it that, Han having been in existence over twenty years, and the world united, it was time to change the start of the year, redo the system of clothing colors, fix the titles of offices and revitalize ritual and music. So he assembled a rough draft of dynastic standards, making yellow the supreme color and five the normative number and totally revising the office titles, and submitted it.

b. meton war

戰: 齊桓任戰而伯天下 The Foursquare Marquess of Ch'i employed war to become overlord of the world.

呂: 車甲盡於戰府庫盡於葬此之謂能攻之 Their chariots and armor used up in battle, their treasures exhausted by funerals—that's what is called attacking them internally.

史: 故曰秦之攻燕也戰於千里之外趙之攻燕也戰於百里之內 Thus I say that for Ch'in to attack Yen is to fight over a thousand li away; for Chao to attack Yen is to fight less than a hundred li away.

後: 然光武以來中國無警百姓優逸忘戰日久 But since the time of Kuang-wu [AD 25-58] the heartland has not had a call to arms, citizens are content at their ease and their memory of combat fades daily.

戰: 由此觀之惡有不戰者乎古者使車轂擊馳言 [語] 相結天下爲一約從連橫兵革不藏文士並飾諸侯亂惑萬端俱起不可勝理科條既備民多僞態書策稠 [濁] 濁百姓不足上下相愁民無所聊明言章理兵甲愈起辯言偉服戰攻不息繁稱文辭天下不治舌弊耳聾不見成功行義約信天下不親於是乃廢文任武厚養死士綴甲厲兵決勝於戰場 Looking at it like this, how could there be anyone who never goes to war? Of old, they sent so many diplomatic embassies that their wheel hubs knocked. Their urgent words never paused/ all the world was the same. They aligned vertically, combined horizontally/ and weapons and armor were always in use. Eloquent officers vied in putting their cases/ and the barons were muddled and misled. A million variations all arose/ and could never be sorted out. When ranks and grades had all been established/ many people put on false airs and pretenses. Books crammed the shelves/ most people suffered want. Superiors and inferiors blamed each other/ the people had no one to look to. The more that clear speech made reason obvious/ the more arms and armor went into action. Clever talk was ever more grandiloquently flaunted/ but aggressive war never stopped. With florid declamation of literary phrases/ the world never was put into order. But stilling of tongues and stopping of ears/ never met with success either. With doing right and keeping promises/ the world became no more brotherly. At that point they laid aside civil measures and employed military ones. They lavishly supported warriors willing to die; sewn-plate armor and sharp weapons delivered victories on the field of battle. [Each couplet rimes.]

以戰續之 Now, bringing in profit by doing nothing or enlarging one's territory while sitting in safety, even the five emperors, three kings, five overlords, intelligent patriarchs and capable rulers of ancient times always wanted to make that happen without exerting themselves, but their situation made them unable to do that, so they resorted to war.

with the literature of kindness and right behavior and their recognition of the scholarship of ancient and modern times. If they merely plied their native wit to get clothing and food, and passed their months and years until their heads got white and their teeth fell out without ever understanding these, they would be the inferiors of the barbarians.

左: 執事以伯召諸侯而以侯終之何利之有焉 Your leaders summoned the barons in your capacity as overlord; if you now dismiss them in the [lesser] capacity of marquess, what profit is there in that?

絕: 句踐之時天子微弱諸侯皆叛 In the time of Kou Chien, the emperor was weak and negligible and the barons all went their own ways.

史: 武王伐紂不期而會孟津之上八百諸侯 When the Martial King attacked Chòu, eight hundred barons met him at Mèng Chin without prearrangement. [八百 put caus fac + 諸侯 obj = nuc] 國: 其若爲諸侯笑何 what could that have to do with being ridiculed by the barons?

衡: 名布爲侯示射無道諸侯也 Giving the name g'u to a piece of cloth demonstrates shooting at feudal lords who lack the Way.

戰: 利盡西海諸侯不以爲貪 We get all the western wilderness and the barons do not consider us greedy. 非: 遇諸侯有禮義則役希起 If he treats the other rulers with courtesy and propriety then occasions for military action will seldom arise.

多: 九合諸侯 convened the barons [called "gungsel." 牧: 諸侯之子稱公子 The sons of feudal lords are 左: 君若苟無四方之虞則願意假寵以請於諸侯 Should your lordship chance to have no concern from your neighbors, then we would like to make some requests of the barons under your auspices.

風: 孟軻受業於子思既通游於諸侯 Mencius was trained by Tzù-szü. When had passed he went traveling among the courts of the barons.

越: 乃拜棄爲農師封之台號爲后稷姓姬氏后稷就國爲諸侯 He thereupon appointed Ch'i to be secretary of agriculture, and enfeoffed him in Tai as Prince Millet with the surname Chi clan. Prince Millet proceeded to his country as its lord.

露: 號爲諸侯者宜謹視所候奉之天子也 One who is styled "feudal lord" ought to meticulously attend the emperor whom he serves and upholds. [Punning *fety*mo like this are common in Han writing, notably in 釋名, 說文 and 白虎通義. It should not be necessary to point out that they are irrelevant to serious etymology.]

b. meton for their fiefs

史: 魏地方不至千里卒不過三十萬地四平諸侯四通幅瀟無名山大川之限 The territory of Wei is not even a thousand square li; its manpower does not exceed 300,000. Its land is level on all sides, other fiefs connected to it on all sides, converging like spokes in a wheel. It has no barriers of famous mountains or great rivers.

ṭiog ugiwəng hereditary nobility created by Han emperor 諸侯王

inally, at the time of the founding emperor, it was ordered that ruling nobles should all establish ancestral temples to the founder's father in their capitals. 史: 於是皇帝輦出房百官執[職→]幟傳警引諸侯王以下至吏六百石以次奉賀 At this, the emperor's sedan chair came out from his chamber and the corp of officials raised their banners to pass along the alert. From the imperial princes on down to officials of six hundred shih, all offered their felicitations in rank order.

史: 辛巳高后崩遺詔賜諸侯王各千金將相列侯郎吏皆以秩賜金 On the day hsin-szü the Empress Regent died, leaving an order granting a thousand ducats to noble lords; to generals and merit lords and household officials it granted ducats according to their pay grade.

漢: 天無二日土無二王百王不易之道也漢氏諸侯或稱王至于四夷亦如之違於古典繆於一統其定諸侯王之號皆稱公及四夷僭號稱王者皆更爲侯 There are not two suns in the sky nor two kings in the earth; this is a way which has never been altered by any king. Some nobles of the royal family take the title king, and even some of the non-Chinese do that. This departs from the ancient statute and deviates from the single line of descent. The determination: the title of the princes will in all cases be duke and those non-Chinese given the false title king will in all cases have that altered to marquess.

淮：周公事文王也行無專制事無由己身若不勝衣言若不出口有奉持於文王洞洞屬屬而將不能恐失之可謂能子矣 When the Duke of Chou served the Cynosure King, in none of his actions did he decide on his own, nor in any of his doings did he suit himself. He carried himself as if his clothes were too heavy for him; he spoke as if he barely had a voice. When he had a presentation to make to the Cynosure King he shilly-shallied as if faced with what he could not do, afraid he would make a botch of it. He can be judged able to behave as a son should.

淮：武王崩成王幼少周公繼文王之業[履→]展天子之籍聽天下之政平夷狄之亂誅管蔡之罪負宸而朝諸侯誅賞制斷無所顧問威動天地聲懾四海可謂能武矣 When the Cynosure King died and the Completion King was still too young, the Duke of Chou took up the heritage of the Cynosure King. He unrolled the records of the emperor, carried out the governance of the whole world, suppressed the rebellion of the barbarians, and punished the crimes of Kuan and Ts'ai. By nothing more strenuous than leaning on the imperial chamber-screen, he brought the barons to his court in submission. Rewarding and punishing, deciding and determining, in no case did he need advice from others. His aura of power moved sky and earth; his reputation overawed the world. He can be judged able to use force.

淮：成王既壯周公屬籍致政北面委質而臣事之請而後為復而後行無擅恣之志無伐矜之色可謂能臣矣故一人之身而三變者所以應時[矣→]也 When the Completion King grew up the Duke of Chou rolled up the records, turned over the government, faced north, handed in his tallies and served him as a minister. He never acted without permission, never departed without reporting. He had no intention of being his own master, showed no pride in his accomplishments. He can be judged able to behave as a servant should. Thus three changes within the life of one man were his way of responding to the needs of the times.

左:吾乃今知周公之德與周之所以王也 Only now do I recognize the charisma of the Duke of Chou and the reason for Chou's assuming the kingship.
